The Godfather III — A disappointing finale to a masterful series. Al Pacino plays Michael Corleone, the Godfather who tries to break from his Mafia ties and go legitimate. Director Francis Ford Coppola does himself in when he casts his daughter Sophia, as one of the leads. She can't act to save her life. If you haven't seen the other two Godfather's don't bother with this one, if you have, check this one out, it does have a few interesting twists. C+

Indecent Proposal — Woody Harrelson and Demi Moore play a married couple who fall into hard times financially. They don't want to lose the house he designed and built for her, so they go to Hollywood and of course, lose all their money. Enter one Robert Redford who offers a cool million for one night with Demi Moore, and what you get is a really dumb movie. A strong performance

Gallery host to exhibits

Displays depict motion, transformation

By CHRISTINA ORWICZ
Collegian Staff

The University Gallery is currently showing Shirazeh Houshiary's "Turning Around the Centre" and Vija Clemin's "Printed Matter". Houshiary's exhibit is a selection of four sculptures along with a set of pastel and mixed media drawings entitled "The Enclosure of Sanctity" as well as a set of paintings done in acrylic and graphite, mounted on aluminum, entitled "Open Secret".

Houshiary's sculptures, "Turning Around the Centre", consist of lead and gold leaf, one-meter cubes. The tops of the cubes are cut in geometric shapes, some purely black, others lined with gold. The way in which Houshiary made the cuts lends the light to play with what is actually viewed; differing angles of observation will show altering colors and shadows of the sculpture.

"Open Secret" as well as "The Enclosure of Sanctity" also lend themselves to play with light, allowing the viewer to see different subjects within one work. "The Enclosure of Sanctity", with the use of almost iridescent green and shades of grey, makes the actual outline of the subject elusive, revealing different objects with varying light and distance from the drawing. "Open Secret", with the use of acrylic and graphite, also gives the outline an elusive quality. With different positions of light, it is difficult to discern whether one is looking into a shape, and if light is coming through the shape, or whether one is looking at an enclosed figure, with light coming from the outside. These plays of, and with light, are in focus with what the artist attempts to comment on in her regard of relationship between art and the soul, as well as the "unsustainable moment of transformation."

Clemins' series of lithographs, mezzotints, aquatints, as well as other forms of rendering, bring to mind old black and white photographs. With scrupulous attention to the detail of her matter, Clemins depicts night skies, deserts and oceans with arresting reality, and having worked with photographs taken by NASA, it is not difficult to see how she has received inspiration.

"Printed Matter" first strikes the viewer with extreme realism and appreciation for intricate detail. But after looking through the series of 20 works, the irony of the work becomes apparent. Although the artist represents seemingly vast areas of space, there is no one point of focus. Also, when these vast spaces are rendered, there is the reality that they are somehow represented in often flat and two-dimensional ways. This depiction of images bordering between vast and restricted, remote and detailed, are part of what Clemins attempts to address in her work: issues of representation and reality.

Survey of foreign students highlights U.S. education

By TRACEY DELZELL &
GEORGIA PAPADOPOULOU
Collegian Correspondents

Many students experience homesickness at one time or another, but for the hundreds of Europeans studying within the Five College Area, the prospects of an American degree and a different culture help them adjust to their new environment.

Some European students apply to American universities individually, but for others spending a year in the States is a requirement from their home universities.

They came to the University of Massachusetts for various reasons; Tina Kontogiannopoulos, a sophomore from Athens, Greece, came here because her school has a special program with the university. For Simon Graves, a sophomore who hails from England, UMass was the closest university to Canada, where he spent a year with many friends.

Many are here to study for the full four years it takes to complete their bachelor's degree, but others are here on exchange through their respective courses back home. These courses offer the students the opportunity to study for a year or two at various colleges throughout the States, with any credit that they gain going toward their final grade for their degree back home. According to some English students who are studying at UMass, their professors at home will approve any grades given by the American ones.

"Because our material is looked at when we get back home, we really do not know what our final grade will be," says James Marrison, an exchange sophomore from Oxford, England.

Most European students believe that having studied abroad, more job opportunities will be open to them when they return home, because employees will look positively at the experience they gained during their time in the States.

"Geneva is a very small city with limitations, the American system of education offers many more possibilities. Here I can better my English as well as broad-by Redford (why he signed to do this movie still amazes me) can't save this movie. I know a lot of you are thinking, "Marty, we don't want the horror of Apocalypse Now, we want escapist fantasy, like Indecent_Proposal." In reply, I state simply, "Oh well, whatever, nevermind". D

The Legend of Billie Jean — They say it's not what you know, but who you know in Hollywood casting, and this movie proves it. It just so happens that the lead of this movie, Helen Slater, her mother is a major agent in Hollywood. Guess who is Helen's brother...yup...Christian. Both Helen and Christian Slater get their start in this waste of film about teenage rebellion. Spare yourself the agony of watching this predictable mess, and go feed the ducks by the pond. D-

Movies not reviewed on HSCN: Sleeping with the Enemy, The Temp, Thank God It's Friday, The Bible, The Butcher's Wife, Children of the Corn II, Compromising Positions, The Crying Game, Excessive Force, The Morning After, For the Boys, Lost in Yonkers, and Mountains of the Moon.

James also relates some of the benefits of experiencing a different culture, aside from the academic plusses.

"In Geneva everyone dresses the same way. If you do not have the latest fashion you are just not 'in' and not part of the group. Here everyone dresses the way they want, and they are accepted," James said.

Europeans also find that after having been more openly subjected to students of many different racial backgrounds and various sexual preferences, they find themselves being much more open-minded.

One thing that all the foreign students cannot get used to is the legal drinking age, because in most of their countries the drinking age is 17 or 18 years of age. They all agree that because the drinking age is so high, this results in some Americans abusing alcohol and many teenagers experimenting with drugs. Alan Barewing, a sophomore from Gilford, England, points out that because it is socially acceptable, usually Europeans drink sensibly and in moderation.

All of the students interviewed welcomed the opportunity to study in the States and if they had to do it all over again, would not hesitate.

Rangers surprise early

NHL players and coaches are hoping that the referees follow the American Airlines flight attendants lead and come back to work soon. In an attempt to give the replacement refs respect, the league is imposing fines on any players or coaches who criticize their officiating. Fortunately this doesn't apply to writers because I'd be in the red. The scabs have been horrendous. The NHL has already been plagued this season by injuries to its superstars, if the refs continue to have no control, the casualties could continue to mount.

BETWEEN THE PIPES Mike DiGiovanni on the NHL

The Rangers continue to burn me for not picking them to finish first in the Atlantic Division. The Blueshirts had their 14 game unbeaten streak snapped at Nassau Coliseum by their crosstown rivals, the New York Islanders. But except for that one blemish, the Rangers have been playing as well as anyone in the league. They are 13-1-2 in their last 15 games and have the second best record in hockey. There is limited optimism beginning to surface in the Big Apple, but the curse of 1940 still looms large.

It seems like everyone is trumpeting a shootout as the cure to the abundance of ties in the NHL. Everyone from "hockey expert" Michael Eisner to Bruins Coach Brian Sutter have praised its possibilities. Well, this columnist disagrees.

A shootout eliminates the value of strong defense in determining the outcome of a close game. Teams like Los Angeles and Detroit that have flashy talented forwards and weak defenses would win more games than they deserve in a shootout system, while teams like Boston and Montreal that rely on a hard-hitting defensive style of play would lose out.

In an attempt to make hockey more "TV friendly," league officials are tampering with the game itself. The only games that need decisions are playoff games.

Who'd have ever thought that the hockey in Hartford would ever be better than hockey in Edmonton? They have the worst record in the league, including the expansion teams. The return of Glen Sather to the bench isn't going to do much to improve this talentless bunch. Now there is talk of trading Bill Ranford, one of the few remaining reasons for Oiler fans to still watch. Does the downfall of a franchise after selling the best player in the game sound familiar to any die hard Red Sox fans?

Tip to campus hockey fans: Check out the USA vs. Russia game at Mullins tonight. Even though the Cold War has ended, the excitement of this game still has international appeal. The Miracle on Ice of 1980 is still fresh in the minds of many hockey fans, who would like nothing more than to see the United States upset the Russians again.

The Americans has been impressive so far in their pre-Olympic tour. They are 3-1-1 against NHL clubs, including a 4-0 shutout of the Chicago Blackhawks.

The Minutemen surprised a lot of people going wire to wire with a good Division I St. Lawrence team. This team is for real and still improving. Coach Mallen's boys could surprise Merrimack, when the rematch takes place here Feb. 6. You heard it here first.

A visit from the band would go a long way to making UMass hockey more appealing to the fans. The overplay of "Great Balls of Fire" and "Black Betty" CDs during the breaks in the action are better than silence, but the presence of the band could be an infusion of spirit.

How about "Boxin'" John Blue mixing it up with Toronto's Rob Pearson. The endless search for a replacement for Lyndon Byers may finally be over.

My readership decreases by one next semester as my number one fan won't be back. A recent Gallup Poll has determined that this constitutes a 50 percent loss. Farewell.

WOMEN'S HEALTH DISCUSSION GROUP

The women's health committee was established in Fall 1992 by concerned students, campus community members and UHS staff to collect information on the health care needs of women at UMass and the extent to which the University Health Service meets those needs.

The focus group will be audiotaped for transcription purposes and kept strictly confidential. Any names mentioned will be deleted from the transcript.

Let us talk openly about your perceptions and experiences with health care services. Please help us create a vision for women's health at UMass by attending the discussion.

unwinnable and losing the game they had well in hand with 2:30 left in the 4th.

CarQuest, CarQuest, CarQuest ... if you're an Eagles fan, that's gotta be tough to swallow.

The fact remains, however, that the Mountaineers won that game and didn't move up a notch. They beat the man who beat the man who beat THE MAN and are now forced to decide between the Cotton Bowl, where they'd face a highly-ranked opponent in No. 6 Texas A&M or run for the extra $1 million of the Sugar Bowl, excuse me USF&G Sugar Bowl, and take on either Alabama or Florida.

The whispers are circulating that if WV heads to the Sugar Bowl and it looks like they will, they'll lose respect in the eyes of the almighty pollsters for facing a lower-ranked opponent. Don't forget, these pollsters who are enamored with A&M are the same ones who loved Syracuse at the beginning of the year.

Even the most corrupt sport in the land — I'm talking about professional boxing — makes more sense than this coalition poll garbage. When James "Buster" Douglas stunned the world and knocked Mike Tyson silly, as much as they wanted to, the sanctioning bodies did not turn around and give the belt back to Iron Mike just because he had the most talent and had defeated tougher opponents a la FSU.

Evans, Moriarty lead UMass over Trinity

By MATT VAUTOUR
Collegian Staff

Special teams were key again as the University of Massachusetts hockey team pounded Trinity 7-0 last night.

Mike Evans was in the center of the action again, scoring the first two Minuteman goals. At 5:15 of the first period, with UMass on the powerplay,

Trinity College	0

Evans finished of a picture perfect passing combination from Dennis Wright and Blair Wagar to put the Minutemen ahead 1-0.

The short-handed combination of Evans and Dennis Wright gave UMass a two goal advantage at 16:32 when Evans drilled a slapshot past Trinity goalie Jason Pinto.

Despite what the score implies, Pinto played spectacularly for the Bantams in a losing cause, making some brilliant saves early to keep Trinity in the game. He turned back 17 shots in the first period before a tired, porous defense let the Minutemen open the flood gates.

Trinity could muster no offense as their dump-and-chase style proved ineffective on the large ice surface at the Mullins Center. The Bantam defense allowed the Minuteman forwards to roam freely in front of the net, which led to some easy goals.

The Minutemen added two more in the second period. Wagar exploited the man advantage situation for his sixth goal of the year. He took a pass from Dale Hooper, and deked a Bantam defensemen and Pinto for the power-play tally.

With Evans in the penalty box for interference, Rob Bonneau continued the short-handed heroics as he collected a pass from Tiger Holland, flew by the Trinity defense and beat Pinto to make it 4-0.

The third period was more of the same, as Bonneau added his second of the night blasting a shot past a visibly tired Pinto less than two minutes into the final period.

Armand Latulippe netted his third goal of the year four minutes later, beating Pinto on a long slapper.

The hustle of the fourth line of Gerry Cahill, Steve Corradi and Jason Smith finally paid off as Cahill finished out the Minuteman scoring with less than five minutes to play.

Frustrated by the deficit, the Bantam tempers began to flare, causing a large increase in hitting and behind-the-play confrontations. Trinity junior Patrick Ashe played a particularly cheap game, prompting the Mullins crowd to break into a "Kill Sixteen (Ashe's jersey number)". Tony Giusto readily obliged as he and Ashe exchanged a couple of hooks and jabs, resulting in matching double minors for roughing.

"I was a little disappointed at what happened at the end of the game and I let that player know it," said UMass Coach Joe Mallen. "We don't need that. We want to play with class and finish with class."

Rich Moriarty recorded his second straight shutout, facing only 16 shots .

The domination of the Division III opponents, combined with the Minutemen's strong showing last weekend against St. Lawrence has Mallen's team excited at its future prospects.

"We're really trying to improve, and strive toward next year," said Minuteman center Mike Evans. "We don't want to be on the bottom of the pile next year."

When Team USA plays on the Mullins ice tonight, a familiar face to UMass fans will be among their ranks. Minuteman goalie Rich Moriarty will fill in as the back up netminder replacing Garth Snow, who signed to play in the NHL.

"Its a real honor," said Moriarty. "It's going to be great to work out with the guys and see really what it takes to get to that level."

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

Rob Bonneau scored two goals as UMass routed Trinity 7-0. The win improves the Minutemen to 7-2 on the season. They travel to Maine this weekend for games with Colby and Bowdoin.

No Mountains left for WVU

Q: How many pollsters does it take to screw in a light bulb?

A: None, they'd rather screw the West Virginia Mountaineers.

To All Those Yahoos Involved in The Poll Process: Are you serious? We're talking about a team that finished its season undefeated in arguably the most competitive conference in the nation (last week, the Big East had three teams ranked in the top 11 in the country) and even if it wins its bowl game, might still finish only third.

Hideous.

The writers who vote for the Associated Press Top 25 poll saw fit to ruin any hopes WV had of playing for the mythical national championship when they voted the Mountaineers third, setting up a 1-2 showdown between 10-1 Florida State and 11-0 Nebraska in the Orange Bowl.

BLINDSIDED
Sean Hayden on College Football

Take a deep breath because this is about to get sticky.

When the Seminoles lost to Notre Dame two weeks ago, the national championship picture seemed crystal clear. That was until the voters dropped FSU to only second in the poll and this week moved them back up to first on the strength of a 12 point victory over the No. 7 team in the nation.

Meanwhile, the No. 1 team, the Cornhuskers, won by two touchdowns against No. 14 Oklahoma and fell to second in the polls for their effort.

I can't explain why the writers are so ga-ga over the once-beaten Seminoles and are doing everything in their power to give them a shot at the title, ahead of two undefeated teams.

All the experts are harping about the strength of the Seminoles' schedule. Schedule schmedule if you ask me. If the 'Noles were truly a championship ball club, they would have gone undefeated against a championship caliber schedule. If you check your history books, I think you'll find the 1988 NCAA Champion Notre Dame squad had the toughest schedule in the nation and went undefeated.

I can't explain why FSU only fell one spot after losing a last minute contest to the Irish but the Irish fell four spots the next week when they lost a last minute contest to Boston College.

Speaking of BC, the amount of respect I gained for the Eagles and QB Glenn Foley for their upset of the Irish is only matched by the amount of contempt I felt for them by screwing this whole season up by losing to the Mountaineers the next week.

If they had won both, fine. If they had lost both, great. If they had lost to ND and beat WV, even better. But no, they had to go and screw it up by winning the

Minutewomen to debut at home

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's hoop team plays its first home game of the 1993-94 season tonight as the Minutewomen host Northeastern University at the Curry Hicks Cage at 7 p.m.

The Minutewomen are coming off a 97-66 loss at #15 Ohio State, despite some outstanding efforts from super sophomores Octavia Thomas and Melissa Gurile. Thomas exploded for a game-high 31 points and 14 boards and Gurile scored 22 and pulled down 7 rebounds.

Freshman Beth Kuzmeski had a solid first collegiate game, sinking three three-pointers for 12 points to go along with four assists. Kuzmeski started at point guard in place of injured co-captain Tricia Hopson rather than her natural shooting guard position.

Hopson saw limited action against the Buckeyes. According to Minutewoman Coach Joanie O'Brien, Hopson will play in tonight's game despite not being 100 percent. A healthy Hopson at point and Kuzmeski moving back to shooting guard would be a definite bonus for the Minutewomen.

The Huskies are coming off the tough loss against Brown. The Bruins were led by Carrine Jones, who scored 24 points and Julie Davis, who had 12 of her own. Both had a couple of three pointers apiece, proving they can bang the shots from 19'9".

The Minutewomen will rely on their strong inside game. Thomas and Gurile are proving to be two of the top players in the Atlantic-10 conference. Thomas and Gurile claimed the top rookie honors last season, with Thomas winning the A-10 Rookie of the Year and Gurile garnering the ECAC Rookie of the Year. Since last season, both have improved their games.

The Minutewomen must limit the turnovers, a problem that has plagued their play last season as well as the Ohio State game last weekend.

Being a young team, the problem of turnovers is not a surprise. The turnover problem has to be improved in order for the Minutewomen to have a successful season, according to O'Brien. The Minutewomen look to improve on their 33 turnover game against Ohio State.

The Minutewomen look to avenge last season's heartbreaking loss to the Huskies 64-63, the first collegiate game for five members of the 1992-93 Minutewomen squad. Gurile led UMass with 34 points and 13 rebounds.

A-10 fares well in early going

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

With Massachusetts (4-1) opening the season by advancing to the finals of the Pre-season NIT and earning a No. 9 national ranking, the rest of the Atlantic 10 has been overshadowed during the early going.

However, that does not mean the rest of the Atlantic 10 has not been winning like Massachusetts, because it has been. In the conference, only the West Virginia Mountaineers and the idle Temple Owls andRhode Island Ramshave yet to find their way into the win column.

The George Washington Colonials, ranked 22nd nationallly, crushed American University 85-50 in their season opener. The Colonials did it both inside (sophomore center Yinka Dare— 21 points) and outside (10 for 20 from three point land) in the blowout.

St. Joseph's(2-0) played host to an early season tournament, the Hawk Classic, and cruised to victory. In the opening round the Hawks routed Delaware State 90-60. Senior center Carlin Warley led the way with 15 points and 13 rebounds while the three guard attack of Bernard Blunt, Rap Curry and Mark Bass combined for 42 points in the win.

In the championship game, an 87-56 shellacking of Wagner, the Hawks had five guys score in double figures with Warley (16 points, seven rebounds) once again leading the way.

The newest member of the Atlantic 10,Duquesne(1-0), showed both old and new firepower in their 91-70 season opening romp over Robert Morris College. The old firepower, senior center Derrick Alston, scored 18 points despite shooting only 10 for 21 from the free throw line.

Meanwhile, much-heralded freshman shooting guard Tom Pipkins showed his amazing talents by scoring 26 points in his collegiate debut. Pipkins hit six of nine treys.

Perennial A-10 cellar dwellerSt. Bonaventure, rallied past in-state rival Canisius, 86-83, in the Bonnies' season opener. Balance was the key for St. Bonaventure, as six players scored in double figures for coach Jim Baron.

Rutgers Universityadjusted to life without star Steve Worthy pretty quickly, defeating future UMass opponent Manhattan College 70-63.

West Virginia was the one A-10 team which got its season off to a bad start, falling 63-58 to Virginia Tech in an ugly contest. The contest featured 79 missed shots and 55 turnovers. Ugly!

Temple, ranked No. 7 in the nation, opens up its season tonight with a tough one, a road trip to Kansas, while URI travels right down the road to meet Brown University.

Right to litigation approved for LSO

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Staff

The Board of Trustees for the University of Massachusetts met for the official vote on the litigation rights before a full audience in the Campus Center room 163. After positive remarks by President Hooker endorsing the motion, the initiative passed without any objections.

Members of the Radical Student Union held signs that said, "Trustees have damm good reason to fear students," and "student power is in the house."

"The trustees have shown that they are willing to listen to the students, and students are willing to negotiate," said Al Lizana, the student trustee who requested consideration of the bill to the trustees. "Finally it happened — it took seven years."

The passing of litigation rights came after a long battle by Student Government Association and Student Center for Educational Research and advocacy (SCERA).

President Hooker was an important element in persuading the board for the endorsement of litigation. He brought the initiative before the board of trustees for a necessity of litigation during the racial conflicts on campus last year.

"We were about as fractured as we could be with the students," said Hooker. "I want to acknowledge the role of the students in making this happen."

In 1987 the right to litigation was revoked by the board after the Yvette Henry case. The case generated national publicity and Henry sued the university for $13 million after her civil rights were violated. After 1987 LSO operated on a referral basis only.

By passing the motion, Legal Services Office now has the authority to litigate on the behalf of students in cases of consumer, family, landlord/tenant and civil rights law.

However, LSO cannot act on behalf of students in cases of sexual harassment by administrators or violation of civil rights from the university. In such cases, LSO can refer students to outside attorney's equipped to handle the case.

"I am pleased that the trustees have reinstated the litigation rights in certain cases," said Melanie DeSilva, who holds an at-large seat for the Board Of Governors. "But I am disappointed that the right to file suit against the university and university employees was not granted."

Legal Services now joins the ranks of other programs throughout the United States and Canada that provide litigation for students. For the past 19 years, students have been funding a service that they could not have access to.

David Nunez, president of the Student Government Association, expressed pleasure in the victors.

"We are very pleased, it gives us encouragement," said Nunez. "We got most of what we wanted. Credit should be given to SCERA who was the spearhead of this project. This is a new chance for negotiations and a new way

Victim support takes priority

By KELLY SPANG

Editor's note: This is the third article in a three-part series examining rape on the UMass-Amherst campus.

Support for rape victims, not the statistics, is the main concern of the University.

The University publishes an annual report which gives the numbers of sexual assaults but is void of any personal data about victims so as to protect confidentiality.

"The victim's confidentiality is paramount," said Phil Cavanaugh, court officer for the University of Massachusetts police.

The departments providing rape services strictly limit access to rape data. The information given will not specify a particular individual or give exact details of a rape, according the UMass police department.

When the Collegian tried to obtain rape documentation for this three-part series, the police department refused on first request.

The police department and the Collegian compromised after a series of meetings with Cavanaugh and police chief Jack Luippold. The two officials verbally gave the number of rapes and limited circumstances, such as whether alcohol was involved or if the victim knew the rapist.

The written rape reports were kept confidential in compliance with laws protecting the victim's right to privacy.

The Everywoman's Center also stresses confidentiality.

"We regard all records as confidential," said Sage Freechild, of the Everywoman's Center. "The commu-

Israeli teacher killed as violence erupts

By KARIN LAUB
Associated Press

EL BIREH, Occupied West Bank — In the latest assault on Mideast peace plans, Palestinian gunmen killed an Israeli kindergarten teacher and wounded three Jewish settlers Wednesday as they stood by their disabled car.

Two groups of Palestinian radicals opposed to the Israel-PLO autonomy accord claimed responsibility for the drive-by shooting on the West Bank, and settlers swore to do everything they could to block the turnover of authority.

The drive-by attack took place after the bloodiest day in the territories since the Sept. 13 agreement was signed. Unrest in the occupied lands has escalated with the approach of a Dec. 13 deadline, set down in the accord, to start the turnover of control to Palestinians.

Shalva Osana, 24, a teacher at the nearby Beit El settlement, was killed Wednesday and Yitzhak Weinstock, 19, a Jewish seminary student, was critically wounded as they stood outside their rented Fiat Uno. Two other passengers were slightly hurt in the attack at the entrance to El Bireh, seven miles north of Jerusalem.

The car, which had a problem with its exhaust system, was still up on its jack after the attack. There was a pool of blood behind the car and the victims' blood-soaked clothing was piled nearby. Bandages were strewn about on the ground.

AIDS action, awareness heightened

By DEBORAH WHITE
Collegian Staff

You may have noticed yesterday was not just another ordinary day at the University of Massachusetts. Wednesday was World AIDS Day, a national call for AIDS action and awareness. It was expressed at UMass by several groups in different ways.

Queer Campus, a self-described "radical, in your face, queer visibility group," was responsible for the many fierce, AIDS-related posters plastered up all over UMass. "Magic is not the only heterosexual with AIDS," one poster proclaimed. Another read, "Burn the quilt. We're not all dead yet. With millions infected and one more every 17 seconds, needlepoint is not enough."

The group also held a die-in at noon. Occupied by these students "playing dead," the Campus Center concourse resembled a graveyard. The bodies held headstones that said, "Women die twice as fast," and "Killed by government inaction."

"It is so important for students on this campus to be aware of issues surrounding AIDS," said Wendy Mataya, a graduate student participant in the event.

"We got together today because we are angry not only about government inaction, but also, the general apathy and lack of information on this campus," Mataya said.

Other World AIDS Day events included the distribution of free condoms and safe-sex education by WMUA. There were also several events coordinated by the Health Education Division of the University Health Services.

People were invited to pick up information on HIV and to create new panels for the Beyond the

U.S., Europe look to negotiate

By BARRY SCHWEID
Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium — Hints of compromise were everywhere Wednesday as Secretary of State Warren Christopher and U.S. and European trade negotiators began a drive to beat the Dec. 15 deadline for concluding a worldwide trade accord.

"There will be no Dec. 16," Christopher said in warning that negotiations were entering an all-or-nothing phase.

He called for tradeoffs, acknowledging that "none will be easy," and said "they must be made by that final deadline."

The main sticking point concerned a dispute over French farm subsudies.

"Efforts are still needed to reach a compromise," French President Francois Mitterand said after meeting with Chancellor Helmut Kohl of Germany in Bonn. "We are ready to undertake these efforts."

Without agreement by the 15th, Christopher said after a meeting with Sir Leon Brittan, the chief European negotiator on the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, there could be an outbreak of economic warfare, with "a rash of unilateral actions."

On the other hand, Christopher said, an accord would break the grip of recession, give an immediate boost to business confidence and create jobs to lift people's hopes.

"Flexibility has to be met with flexibility," he said. "The ball is in both of our courts and we are moving it back forward."

The goal in Brussels is to settle the remaining differences between the United States and the European Economic Community and take the deal to Geneva as a basis of negotiations for concluding the Uruguay Round of global trade negotiations by the Dec. 15 deadline.

to give the system a chance for students."

At the conclusion of the vote, an unidentified trustee expressed the necessity for better student-trustee relations.

"This was a vote that was not passed out of fear, it was passed out of reason because of positive negotiations with the students," he said.

A Big Deal

There is nothing like a good old fashioned football game to bring out the most interesting rivalries and shenanigans on college campuses. And the end of November brings out only the best of that, as universities traditionally play their biggest rival of the year, in a game which, to some, is more important than life and death.

Texas-Texas A&M, Oklahoma-Nebraska, Michigan-Ohio State, Florida-Florida State, Alabama-Auburn, UCLA-USC and our current favorite Stanford-California are just a few examples.

How big can the game and the pregame festivities get? You couldn't imagine.

Consider the Alabama-Auburn game. Auburn, Ala. and Tuscaloosa, Ala. (home of the University of Alabama) are located about two-and-a-half hours apart and the rivalry between the two schools runs generations deep. These are the two major universities in Alabama. Everyone goes to either one or the other, "Basically you are either one color or the other," said Auburn assistant sports information director Kent Partridge. "You are either orange (Auburn) or red (Alabama)."

Since Auburn is currently on NCAA probation, the Tigers cannot appear on television. Auburn fans had snatched up all 85,214 tickets to its football stadium year in advance, leaving Crimson Tide backers unable to see the game live or even watch the game on television.

Realizing that Crimson backers might go off the deep end without their weekly fix, the NCAA allowed the game to be shown at one closed circuit site on Alabama's campus.

The football stadium was quickly selected and over 45,000 tickets were sold to watch the game on big screen television. The stadium sold out in less than four hours and by game day scalpers were getting $150 for a ticket to watch television. By the way, Auburn won 22-14.

Most interesting this year though is the Bay Area's contest between Stanford and Cal. It is simply referred to as "Big Game" and drew national attention in 1981 when Cal won Big Game on the last play of the game, when it returned a kickoff 90 yards and through the Stanford Band, who had rushed the field to celebrate what they anticipated to be a victory.

One tradition did end this year at Stanford. For some 100 years the school has thrown a pregame bonfire, but the pyre was scrapped this year because the site at Lake Lagunita is home to the endangered California tiger salamander. The event is now called "nonfire."

This year, security at 82,500-seat Stanford Stadium was increased for Big Game because last season's game got out of control.

Tradition calls for the awarding of the "Sacred Axe" to the team which wins the game. At the end of the game, the axe was traditionally given to the band of the winning team, but last season when Cal won the tool of George Washington, rambunctious students took the axe and tried to chop down the famed Stanford tree. (Stanford teams are nicknamed The Cardinal, after a tree, not the species of bird.)

Those crazy Berkeley students also heaved loads of fresh fruit at the Stanford Band and cheerleaders.

"The presence of the axe is a provoking device," Stanford senior Steve Zika, who chairs the actual Axe Committee, told The Stanford Daily. "It can be the cause of a riot."

Whoa Nelly, they take their pigskin seriously in Cali.

Burning mad

At the Masachusetts Institue of Technology, students protested the school's new harassment guide book last month by burning the book, according to The Tech, the student newspaper at the Cambridge school.

Students cited a new hate speech section of the guide book, which they argue, limits free speech on campus. MIT's speech code disallows any speech which someone else finds at all offensive. It was designed to "create an environment of civility," according to MIT officials.

Students say it is just another political correct idea gone bad.

Buildings to bear donor's names

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts trustees voted yesterday to name campus buildings for major donors, drawing criticism from the W.E.B. DuBois petition coalition, a campus group who hope to see the tower library named after the Black rights activist.

Chancellor David K. Scott said he realized the policy's intent is to raise money through the use of building naming.

He said he is still considering the initiative to name the library after DuBois. The trustees, however, will make the final decision on the proposal.

Several trustees said people who have not made major contributions could still have buildings named for them under the new policy.

The policy states buildings be named "in response to the donation of a significant gift to the University."

Heriberto Flores, a trustee, voted for the 18-0 policy, but expressed his fear that this would shut out all but White males.

An educator and a historian, DuBois was born in 1868 in Great Barrington. He founded a group that later evolved into the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

The tower library holds more than 130,000 pages of DuBois' work.

The library, which is 20 years old, has no official name, but is most often referred to as the "tower library."

Members of the petition coalition said they believed the policy was specificaliy aimed at blocking their proposal.

Martin Jones, president of the American Freedom Foundation, said he believed that naming the library after DuBois could bring in donations from wealthy Black alumni.

Jones also announced his group's official suggestion for a new school mascot. The University's current mascot, the Minuteman, is considered by the group to be racist, sexist and oppressive.

Jones said it was never the intention of the group, however, to attack the minuteman personally or its historical legacy.

The alternative logo, suggested by the group, is the "liberator," which will be symbolized by a torch similar to the one held by the Statue of Liberty.

The chancellor ordered a review of the mascot idea, but later reneged it when faced with alumni outcry and ridicule from the national media.

The trustees also gave President Michael K. Hooker the authority to drop a system ban on investments in companies that do business with South Africa.

Mountain bikers hold forum

Students discuss off-road trails, environmental effects

By JUSTIN DOYLE
Collegian Staff

The issue of mountain biking and the environment was a major topic of concern last night when the Conservation Commission of Amherst held a Mountain Bike Forum at the Bangs Community Center.

Andy Muller, a graduate student at UMass began the forum by explaining the need for the Mountain Bike Forum.

"The reason for the forum was to see what kind of interest we could pique," said Muller. "We want to address the status of mountain biking in Amherst, create an arena and start developing the idea of forming a user group."

Muller used the Green Mountain National Forest working group as an example of how a user group can form to take action to preserve biking and hiking trails. He also addressed the issue of protecting the environment.

The second part of the forum was a slide show of Amherst trails. Pete Westover, a member of the Conservation Commission, pointed out trouble areas where the use of mountain bikes would do damage to the trails. Many of the bad areas in the trails had water damage.

"We are concerned with the erosion of the trails at the banks of brooks and other spots were water might collect," said Westover.

The issue of mountain biking and the condition of the trails was a major concern. The Conservation Commission raised the idea of having three kinds of trails, one for mountain bikers, one for hikers, and one for both.

The Conservation Commission then allowed the crowd of approximately 30 to respond to the issues presented and give ideas or suggests. Many people used the opportunity to voice their opinions on the mountain bikers.

The question of the respectfulness of mountain bikers toward the trails and hikers arose. Mountain bikers often tear up trails when they ride in large groups. A hiker also complained about some bikers disregard for people walking on the trails.

Todd Sutherland, the head instructor of the mountain biking class at UMass, came to the defense of mountain bikers.

"Mountain bikers should not be stereotyped," said Sutherland. "The attitudes of some individuals does not represent the attitudes of all mountain bikers."

The Conservation Commission took suggestions about how to help preserve the trails to all those who want to use them. The Conservation Committee will have a follow-up meeting on Feb. 2, at 7 p.m. in the Large Activity Room, at the Bangs Community Center.

names Quilt Project. This quilt, made up of commentary on HIV by the Five College community, is being displayed at the Student Gallery until friday.

The Gallery dimmed its lights as part of "A Day Without Art," a national expression of remembrance of the many artists who have died of AIDS.

Health Services and the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns co-sponsored an evening of remembrance. People gathered at 6:30 p.m. for a candlelight vigil, songs by the A Cafellas and the UMass Gospel Choir, and a slide show about the origins of the Names Quilt Project.

Litigation rights restored

To students, legal services is a valuable asset in a pool of resources offered by a university. Many students at the University of Massachusetts cannot afford the high cost of legal representation in legal areas that affect their lives, such as landlord/tenant, family, employment, consumer protection and civil rights law.

Such disputes would cost hundreds to thousands of dollars for UMass students, who are already paying tuition at the second most expensive public university in the United States.

Litigation rights were removed from the Legal Services Office in 1987 by the Board of Trustees, and for the past 19 years students have been funding and supporting a service they did not have access to.

Yesterday, in a vote by the Board of Trustees, litigation rights were restored to the Legal Services Office. Such a vote was imperative in acknowledging the involvement and rights of university students. Litigation in cases against municipalities and those against the University, even in cases of sexual harassment by professors or administrators, is still prohibited. In such cases, LSO can refer a student to an outside attorney.

LSO has been granted litigation authority on behalf of students and to inform them of their rights under the law. This vote by the Board of Trustees is the beginning of a new relationship between the administration and students.

Ferris Bueller once said, "Life moves pretty fast, and if you don't stop and look around a bit, you just might miss it." Well, good ole Ferris was absolutely correct. Life, and time for that matter, do pass by quite quickly.

Adam Scott
ROBERTS

In fact, the joys and memories of life are just like St. Elmo's fire. One minute the flame is there and then poof — it's gone. If we all listen to what Ferris said, then we can stop and see the flame before it vanishes into thin air, never to be seen again.

Ferris epitomized youth and his love for life and adventure. Like, Ferris, I too am ready for adventure. It took a lot of thinking but I decided that when opportunity knocks, by all means, answer. So, I did the not-so-unthinkable and withdrew myself from the university.

What will I do now that I no longer attend UMass legally? I'm on the Holiday Road, (without the Griswalds) and I'm packing my bags for Europe. I'm moving to London, a place I'm sure has a lot more to offer me than Amherst.

After all, you only live once, and by being a firm believer of never wanting to say, "i would have, I should have and I could have," I'm not letting this once-in-a-lifetime opportunity slip through my fingers like sands through the hourglass. After all, these are the days of our lives.

This past semester I made numerous new friends whom I'm really going to miss, in addition to my old friends. On occasion I have asked myself, is it worth it? I know that while I'm away I will change. I won't be the same person when I return and I'm sure that my friends will have changed too. Over time we all grow and learn new things to become better individuals. But this is a risk I have to take. Life is not risk-free. There are no guarantees. We are all in this game together.

I'm leaving because I have to do this. I'm not sure what will be here for me when I return. I don't want to stay and berate myself daily by asking "what would have happened differently had I gone to London?" Instead, I'll be thinking, "What would have happened differently had I stayed?" In reality, I don't think I'll ask the latter.

I have decided to find out what will happen differently by breaking from the norm and venturing off to a place I've never been. Who knows, maybe somewhere over the rainbow I'll find Oz. So, I'll travel that yellow brick road, meet a lot of new people that I probably would have never met before, and see Europe, a place rich in history.

Maybe I'm just like Elmo on Sesame Street, an energetic and imaginative fury red monster whose favorite words are who, what, where, when, how and especially why; whose childlike exuberance gives me unlimited confidence.

I guess it's my own manifest destiny to explore the world. As I sit here contemplating my life abroad I can't help from hearing Styx singing, "I'm sailing away . . ." like a ship on an open sea. And to quote Michael Jordan, "Take a good look, because one minute I'll be there and the next minute I'll be gone."

Your poetic license, please

I was in a local department store the other day trying to find a new word processor. I wanted to replace my outdated "technologically challenged" system.

"...but mainly I'm looking for one with Mailmerge," I told the salesman.

"Wonderful!" he shot back with obviously false delight. "I believe we here at Bud's Words and Weapons can be of service. Come look at this beauty here. It's a Brother WP 1 googleplex. It should have everything you're looking for. I mean, look at what a large number it has in its name. And right now it's on sale for just $500. Isn't that wonderful?"

Ted
MARCUS

He showed me some of its features and said "wonderful" a few more times.

"Do you take checks?" I inquired.

"Yessir. I just need to see two forms of ID and your license."

"I was going to use my driver's license as one of the two forms," I said.

"No Sir," he said in a less than pleased tone. "Your poetic license."

"My wha...?"

"Your poetic license, sir," he interrupted, over-emphasizing "sir." "Don't tell me that you don't have one."

"But that's just a term," I said. "There's no such thing as a real..."

"It was part of the Frady Bill that Congress just approved. I take it you also don't know about the five-day waiting period before you can actually pick up your word processor."

"A five-day what?" I demanded.

"So a background check can be done. Listen, they need to make sure that you've never used names or labels that may offend other people. You know — to make sure that you've only used the politically correct lexicon in your writings.

"Don't you read the papers?" he asked, shifting his tone from a salesman to a gut at the local saloon. "The main thing is this guy Frady got a nasty letter from a total stranger one day, and it really bummed him out. Well, the press got a hold of the story and then everybody in the country, well, almost everybody, knew about it and demanded action from their elected leaders. I mean, you can't blame them — random insults have become the nation's leading cause of people bumming out.

"So," he continued, "they passed this bill to try to put a dent in the number of insults-of-passion that are spewed every day. It's supposed to allow people time to cool off before they go off half-cocked and mail or fax somebody into a miserable day."

I understood that point because I wanted to run home, sit in front of my keyboard and mail off a nasty letter to my representative for passing such a ridiculous law.

"You know what I think?" he threw in, just in case I cared about his thoughts. "I think that everybody's insulting each other because nobody likes each other. I mean, there are plenty of socioeconomic reasons too, but it all boils down to the fact that everybody has to live so close to each other nowadays, and nobody likes to be within earshot of one another."

Frustrated, I left the store and decided to walk home. Halfway there I heard a voice come form an alleyway.

"Hey mister, you wanna buy a word processor?"

Happy birthday Sesame Street!

All my life the great show Sesame Street has been on television. How is it that a show can actually be on television for 25 years?

I think Sesame Street is great. It's good for kids and adults too. I grew up with Sesame Street and so did you! I bet you had a stuffed muppet from Sesame Street when you were little.

How many of you have ever looked in your soup for a fly? Maybe even talked to your rubber duckie like Ernie? Or walked like a pigeon with Bert? How about questioning the world like any muppet on this wonderful show. Each of the muppets had questions that sometimes children are too afraid to ask. Sesame Street helps kids grow through every age. It even helps kids get over their fear of monsters.

Kids love this show because it is on their wavelength. Parents love it because it teaches their kids very important things and is a good preparation for entering school. The executive producer of this show states, "Parents know they can leave the room and know that their children will be safe." It is one of TV Guide's best shows for kids.

Finally, I just want to say happy birthday to Bert, Ernie, Elmo, Grover, The Count, Cookie Monster, and Big Bird (Big Bird has been on the show since it started and is still only 6-years-old).

On Monday, Nov. 22, 1993, Sesame Street started its 25th season. Open your imagination again and watch this wonderful show.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

As the tip-off between Massachusetts and North Carolina approached last Wednesday, Tar Heel fans were approaching people in the UMass section of the Madison Square Garden and reminding us that UNC was the defending national champion.

One enthusiast in particular, wearing Carolina blue from head to toe (sneakers included), sat next to us during the game. He admitted he knew little about the Minutemen, but told us he still felt sorry for UMass.

"Hey, they're the No. 1 team in the country for a reason, guys," he told us. "They earned it."

Then the Minutemen beat the unbeatable Tar Heels in overtime.

As the final seconds wound down, UMass fans stormed the court and Lou Roe left with a huge smile on his face. Eric Montross and Dean Smith watched from the North Carolina bench in stunned amazement as reality sunk in.

I looked for that talkative UNC fan, but I couldn't find him. I wanted to tell him I knew he was upset, but that right now the Minutemen deserved respect.

They'd earned it.

It's official. Chancellor David Scott presented Dr. Marcellette Williams, his selection for the newly-created position of deputy chancellor, at Tuesday's Board of Trustees meeting.

Scott heaped praise on his appointee, telling those assembled she "can dance with the giants." Perhaps the 'giants' Scott is referring to are those state employees pulling down yearly salaries over the century mark. Williams will get $110,000 annually before benefits.

Her husband, Keith, comes as part of the package deal in another brand-new position. While he'll only be making $75,000 a year, the Williamses' combined salaries would make any young couple feel like dancing.

Mike
CARVALHO

The Williamses are certainly capable of excelling in their new positions — especially since they will be writing their job descriptions as they go — but they have one qualification that stands out: both worked at Michigan State University when Scott was MSU provost.

On the chance that further budget cuts and hiring freezes will spurn our chancellor to hire still more administrators to fill an already-crowded Whitmore, this space wholeheartedly endorses the display of Michigan State paraphernalia by those seeking high-paying jobs in Scott's administration.

During an interview, mention that you enjoy vacationing in the East Lansing, Mich., area. Wear a green-and-white tie (MSU's colors) and a set of MSU cufflinks. Or, if you're really desperate, get dressed-up in a Spartans sweatshirt, shorts and cap and wave green pom-pons in the air.

Hey, for $100 grand a year, it's worth a shot... Go Spartans!

The Board of Trustees decided yesterday that campus buildings would be named for persons having made significant donations to the university. In other words, you can come up with as many suitable people after whom the Tower Library could be named, but the reality is that the honor of having any residential or academic building named after you is essentially up for bid.

While a policy like this might be good for business, it doesn't seem to fit into the role of an institution of higher learning. Oh yeah, this is UMass.

The world would be a perfect place if everyone read this

The world just ain't perfect.

Damn, even my grammar isn't perfect. Anyway, imagine living in a perfectly perfect world with perfect people, perfect places, and perfect things. Perfection is what everyone desires, seeking the perfect life. Perfect job, perfect car, perfect companions, perfect friends, perfect grades, perfect family life — perfect anything and everything.

There are numerous things that would make the world we call home a perfect place.

The world would be a perfect place if I had a car.

The world would be a perfect place if everyone gathered around, looked at the word perfect, and agreed that, after pondering upon it for a while, realized perfect is one weird word.

The world would be a perfect place if you could pop someone in the head without necessarily injuring them, and not have them retaliate.

The world would be a perfect place if I could wake up with clean underwear folded in my drawer.

The world would be a perfect place if there were multiple peepholes on the doors at the dorms so that more than one person could look out at once.

The world would be a perfect place if everyone agreed with me on everything.

The world would be a perfect place if, after you fall down the stairs in front of a bunch of people, those who laughed at you would fall down the stairs shortly after.

The world would be a perfect place if I had a cruising golf cart to take to classes (not to mention my own parking space at each building).

The world would be a perfect place if the Whitmore Administration Building did not exist.

Andrew
BRYCE

The world would be a perfect place if Hot Heroes were served at the DC each day (or at least that's what my roommate thinks).

The world would be a perfect place if my sheet could stay on my bed after a night's sleep.

The world would be a perfect place if I unpacked my bags upon returning from Thanksgiving break instead of letting my clothes sit in my bag for days.

The world would be a perfect place if I had a cold beer while writing this damn thing.

The world would be a perfect place if cops and criminals utilized Laser Tag instead of real guns.

The world would be a perfect place if Superman, Batman, and Rambo really existed.

The world would be a perfect place if we lived on "Fantasy Island".

The world would be a perfect place if the atomic bomb that everyone fears is actually atomic balm, the creme for muscle aches, the confusion due to a spelling error by someone early on.

The world would be a perfect place if everyone lived like Pee Wee Herman (to explain to all the perverted ones, the way the character Pee Wee lived in Pee Wee's Big Adventure, not public masturbator Paul Ruebens.)

The world would be a perfect place if when my father was taping the UMass basketball team's shocking win over North Carolina, he didn't roll onto the VCR remote control and press stop by accident.

The world would be a perfect place if I just remember that what my father did was just an accident.

The world would be a perfect place if you were not sick of the word "perfect" by the time you got through reading this.

The world would be a perfect place if, after writing all of these thoughts, realizing that the world just wouldn't be a perfect place if most of this stuff occurred, but that it is fun to imagine.

The world would be a perfect place if I just shut up now.

The truth will set you free

"The truth will set you free. But first it will make you mad." — Gloria Steinem

Truth has always been a highly respected concept in our society. We tend to put it on a pedestal, and hold it in the highest regard. After all, we have always been taught that "telling the truth" is the right thing to do, and that we will be respected if we do.

Stephanie
EISENBERG

Yet sometimes the truth can hurt us, because there exist those who do not want to hear the truth, and there are many whose truths differ from our own. Truth, while being a universal concept, has no definition. So often, when we speak our truths we take risks, because we do not know how others will perceive them.

It is the risk factor associated with truth that raises the question as to whether it's really worth it to be honest. Because the concept of truth is different to everyone, when we speak our own truths we open ourselves up and risk getting hurt. Since we do not know how others will view our truth and ideals, everytime we are honest we risk something.

That is because this concept, that the truth, while highly respected as a idea, is becoming less prevalent in our society. Many people, myself included, are sometimes afraid to be honest because we stand a chance of getting hurt. After all, it is much easier to not speak the truth, because there are no risks involved.

I can understand why many people choose not to employ the truth. It's a scary thing to be open and honest. When we are honest with someone we give them a true glimpse of our inner selves. We invite them to share our thoughts and values, with the hope that they will understand us better and respect us more. Unfortunately, life doesn't always work that way. We are not always rewarded for speaking the truth. Sometimes we end up hurt.

Even with all of the risks involved, I am still a strong advocate of truth. I hate getting hurt and I hate taking risks, but I feel the truth should prevail in any circumstance. When we do not speak the truth, we do protect ourselves, but only superficially, because then we deceive ourselves. In order to maintain a decent level of self-respect we must use the truth, because without it we are doing nothing more than playing games.

I confess there was a time when even I, the great truth advocator, played games. I was too afraid to put myself at risk, so I'd hurt others while protecting myself. But in the end, I didn't protect myself from anything; I saved myself from getting hurt, but I lost so much more.

It is true that the truth can hurt, but that is a risk we must take. There are no guarantees in life anyway, and if we spend our whole lives trying to protect ourselves then we miss out.

Life is about taking risks and chances. Life itself is one big chance. It is stupid to waste your life by filling it with fear. We will lose too much this way.

There are many times where I wonder whether the truth is worth it; it is so hard to put yourself on the line and speak your mind completely. But I have learned that in the end, being a truthful speaker will get you much further than being a game-player.

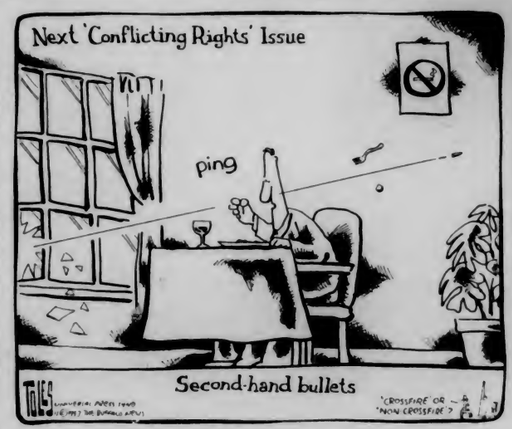
A plea for a little library etiquette

Depending on which direction you were coming from, it was probably the first thing you saw on this campus. If you're like me, you thought it was ugly; a perfect rectangle in that lovely burnt orange color that shot right up into the sky. But hey, it was impressive, it had 26 stories. Most of my friends went to smaller schools; their libraries only had three floors, six at the most. Twenty-six floors of books was pretty cool.

The first thing I learned how to use was the On-Line computer system that helps you find books. And I found out that at the University of Massachusetts the status of all books is "check book stacks," it could have been checked out in 1949 and the computer will still tell you to go look. So, 23 floors and two nauseating elevator rides later I still didn't have the book I wanted. I got it at Amherst College's library.



As my research got more serious I went to Info-Trak, the one-stop shopping center for all your periodical needs. Apart from the requisite wait for a terminal, the system was great to use. Once I found the titles I needed I went to those two big blue books that list all the periodicals the library has. Again impressive, everything from People Weekly to the Review of Radical Political Economics. I got the call number and ventured upwards.

The first bound volume I wanted wasn't on the shelf. The second was there but the month I wanted must have been stolen before it was bound. The third was in its place and complete except, of course, for the article I wanted which somebody apparently couldn't afford to photocopy. I got the articles at Jones Library.

I didn't have time to go to the Robert Frost Library for a book or to Jones Library for an article; I have things to read, I have papers to write. To tell the truth, I didn't have time to write this editorial, but I had to vent and I had to plead.

We can't change the fact that the building is ugly or the book you want is 23 flights up. We can't change the On-Line system to be more accurate or make the copiers work. What we can do is bring books back on time, return periodicals to their sheives and photocopy the article instead of tearing out the original.

An overkill of pop opinion

My house doesn't have a television, so when I was waiting in Health Services trying to get a prescription filled, one of the advertisements on the waiting room T.V. really caught my attention.

There was a shot of some articles of clothing with "Made in the USA" tags proudly embroidered on the inside of the collar. Then there was a shot of a hoard of people lined up at an imposing looking federal building; at the front of the line was an angry looking bureaucrat in an unemployment window, shouting "Next." The voice over then said, "If you don't think the Made in the USA label matters, think again."

Andrew
DAVIDSON

Now I'm not going to say whether or not I agree with the message of this commercial. What caught my interest was how an advertisement on a daytime soap opera could take something as important and complex as international trade and trivialize it to the point that relevant facts are completely overlooked.

This trend is not new to intellectualism in America. In the 1980's, pop psychology shoptalk had sunk to the reading level of breakfast cereal boxes. People convinced themselves they had some kind of remedial understanding of why their personal anger was linked to how they were breast fed as a child; everyone's neighbor professed to be a two-bit psychoanalyst.

Today, the likes of Ross Perot and his sidekick Pat Choate have managed to bring out the economist in people a little more informed than Elmer Fudd with their propagandist collaboration Save Your Job, Save Our Country. Thanks to Larry King, all anyone needs to have an affect on America's economic policy is basic cable service.

Let me illustrate another example. I have an uncle named Samuel. A lot of people think my uncle is in a bit of a financial bind. He owns a number of businesses — he provides security, he runs an office which provides pension funds, and a number of other ventures too numerous to mention. He has so many cash payments to make, however, that he is annually forced to borrow money. This year, he'll have to borrow about $25,000. In total, Sammie is close to $500,000 in debt.

But my uncle's crisis isn't all that it seems. He makes $550,000 a year, which is more than his total debt, and owns over $4 million in various assets. A lot of people criticize my uncle, but I kind of admire him; without his work, many people would be otherwise without insurance, jobless benefits, a stable currency...

If you haven't guessed by now, I don't really have an Uncle Sammie. What I have just done in a roundabout way was to explain the finances of our Federal Government in order to illustrate a point: people aren't always given the complete picture (move the decimal to the right seven places to find out approximations for the U.S. Federal Budget).

Again, I am neither extolling nor condemning the virtues of deficit financing. My point is that when there's a billboard in New York City which has a running total "your family's share" of our national debt, along with barrages of other unaccompanied facts and figures, people can become confused into believing something simply because some journalist felt like subversively imposing his opinion upon someone by twisting some numbers around. What i am saying is this: we are not always informed enough to make opinions about certain issues, especially those as sensitive and intricate as economic policy.

The Economics of the Citibank Classic Visa card. How Student Discounts and Price Protection contribute to upward growth.

A variety of factors have been suggested as contributing to the economic growth of students, including (1) more lottery winners between the ages of 18 and 22, (2) a 37% increase on earnings from bottle and can returns, (3) more students doubling earnings in the lightning round of game shows, and (4) the Citibank Classic Visa* card. It's this last one, however, that affects most students. ¶ The Citibank Classic Visa card offers immediate savings to student cardmembers. You can save up to 26% on long distance calls versus AT&T with the free Citibank Calling Service™ from MCI.[1] And you can capitalize on a $20 Airfare Discount for domestic flights.[2] Savings on mail order purchases, sports equipment, magazines and music also abound. Maximize these savings with a low variable interest rate of 15.4%[3] and no annual fee, and you can significantly improve your personal bottom line (especially if one's net income tends to be pretty gross). Put another way, one might even have enough savings to reinvest in a CD or two (the musical kind, of course). ¶ On the way to the record store, or any store for that matter, take stock of the 3 services concerned with purchases made on the Citibank Classic card. Citibank Price Protection assures one of the best prices. See the same item advertised in print for less, within 60 days, and Citibank will refund the difference up to $150.[4] To protect these investments, Buyers Security™ can cover them against accidental damage, fire or theft (ordinarily causes for Great Depressions) for 90 days from the date of purchase.[4] And Citibank Lifetime Warranty™ can extend the expected service life of eligible products up to 12 years.[5] ¶ But perhaps the features which offer the best protection are your eyes, your nose, your mouth, etc.—all featured on The Photocard, the credit card with your photo on it. Carrying it can help prevent fraud or any hostile takeover of your card. (Insiders speculate that it makes quite a good student ID, too.) Even if one's card is stolen, or perhaps lost, The Lost Wallet™ Service can replace your card usually within 24 hours. ¶ So never panic. As we all know, panic, such as in the Great Panics of 1837, 1857, and 1929, can cause a downswing in a market. But with 24-hour Customer Service, there's no reason for it. A question about your account is only an 800 number away. (Panic of the sort experienced the night before Finals is something else again.) ¶ Needless to say, building a credit history with the support of such services can only be a boost. You're investing in futures—that future house, that future car, etc. And knowing the Citibank Classic Visa card is there in your wallet should presently give you a sense of security, rare in today's—how shall we say?—fickle market. ¶ To apply, call. Students don't need a job or a cosigner. And call if you'd simply like your photo added to your regular Citibank Classic Visa card. Here's the number: 1-800-CITIBANK, extension 19. ¶ The Law of Student Supply and Demand states, "If a credit card satisfies more of a student's unlimited wants and needs, while reducing the Risk Factor in respect to limited and often scarce resources—with the greatest supply of services and savings possible—then students will demand said credit card." So, demand away—call.

No known picture of Washington smiling exists. Economists believe Washington was unhappy, because he felt he could have received a better deal on war supplies. If he used a Citibank Classic Visa card, he would have been assured of getting the best price and probably would have been happier. Artist rendering of how he would have appeared on the dollar.

Monarch Notes® Version:
The Citibank Classic Visa card will be there for you with special student discounts, no fee, and a low rate...so your own economy will be more like a boom than a bust. Call 1-800-CITIBANK, ext. 19.

Not just Visa. Citibank Visa.

Savings claim is based on a 10-minute night weekend call in the 1-91 to 1,000 mileage band using MCI's Card Compatibility rates vs. AT&T's standard calling card rates, effective 4/93. Minimum ticket purchase price is $100. Rebates are for Citibank student cardmembers on tickets issued by ISE Flights only. ‡The Annual Percentage Rate for purchases is 15.4% as of 4/93 and may vary quarterly. The Annual Percentage Rate for cash advances is 19.8%. If a finance charge is imposed, the minimum is 50 cents. Freechild said the law provides for confidential communication.

Support is not only protecting the victim's privacy, but also providing choices. Rape victims are not set to follow any course of action except what is comfortable for the individual, according to various department officials.

"We do not tell a woman what she should do," Freechild said. "We provide information and support so they have choices."

When seeking medical care at Health Services, Dr. Daniel Clapp said the victim has control.

"The victim can expect medical care appropriate for her situation," he said. "She decides how much care she would like."

The UMass police department has a special unit, the Sensitive Crime Group, for dealing with victims of sexual assault.

According to Detective Joanne O'Connor of the UMass police, officers in this unit attended a 40-hour course to learn how to respond to a victim of sexual assault and also gather information about the crime.

When the UMass police receives a report of a sexual assault, a member of this special unit is sent to the victim, said O'Connor.

"The victim is first and foremost," she said.

WOMEN'S HEALTH DISCUSSION GROUP

The women's health committee was established in Fall 1992 by concerned students, campus community members and UHS staff to collect information on the health care needs of women at UMass and the extent to which the University Health Service meets those needs.

The focus group will be audiotaped for transcription purposes and kept strictly confidential. Any names mentioned will be deleted from the transcript.

Let us talk openly about your perceptions and experiences with health care services. Please help us create a vision for women's health at UMass by attending the discussion.

Women can be their own 'knight in shining armor'

BY JOY COLLINS
Collegian Staff

Eighty percent of women who run and yell in a potential sexual assault situation get away, according to a local self defense instructor and survivor.

"People still don't believe that women can really get away. But, I do believe women can fight and get away," Nancy Rothenberg, also a second-degree black belt and founder of The Spirit of The Heart Self-Defense school, said.

"In this culture, as women we are taught to believe that we will be saved by a 'knight in shining armor' or that someone will protect us," Rothenberg said. "We need to start taking responsibility for our own protection and if we want to ask for help we have that option," she said.

Rothenberg said women need to realize that they have been trained to be nice and to put others' needs ahead of their own.

"We don't have to act that way. We can choose our behavior and when we are in danger we can fight," she said.

Self-defense gives women choices when dealing with potentially dangerous situations, Rothberg said. It is important to acknowledge, however, that there is no infallible way to deal with all cases, she said.

"There is no magic 1-2-3 answer," Rothberg said. "Every situation is different. But, I have trust in myself that I can do something even though I never know where, when or how it will happen," she said.

Rothenberg said it is important to trust your instincts. If you feel something is not okay, it is crucial that you act on this feeling and get out of the situation, she said.

"Communication is key — in this society we are afraid to talk about sex . . . sometimes fear of criticism or hurting other people keeps us from setting limits," Rothenberg said.

Knowing and saying what you want and trusting your instincts can help to prevent dangerous situations she said.

Rothenberg said self-defense will not free women of their fear but will help them to deal with it.

"I know women carry a lot of fear . . . self-defense is not a matter of getting rid of it," she said. "It helps women to be more comfortable with, and perhaps tame, their fear but most of all to be aware of it," she said.

Assailants usually assess their possible victims for vulnerability Rothenberg said. "Even when you're scared, try not to look vulnerable," she said.

"It is important that when your walking that your head is up . . . walk strong and make eye contact," Rothenberg said.

Rothenberg said she often uses visualization techniques in her workshops. The students visualize attacks or dangerous situations and imagine themselves having success with defense.

"We try to make it as detailed as possible because [in an actual attack] your mind will remember and be there to help you," Rothenberg said.

Rothenberg said she has found that knowing techniques of self-defense help her to have confidence when confronting people verbally about offensive behavior.

"When you confront someone verbally there is a chance that it will escalate or they will hit you. If you don't have the physical confidence or the tools you are less likely to say anything," she said.

In her class Rothenberg teaches "the 3 A's": Awareness, Assessment and Action. It is important to know what you are dealing with and watch for signs," she said. "Sometimes you might choose to walk away, other times to get help or to fight," she said.

"Self-defense equals empowerment," Rothenberg said. "There is something about empowerment that is real, that comes from a deep place. It is a goal of mine, in my teaching, not just to develop an outside shell that can fight, but to reach an place inside that says 'I am worth defending,'" she said.

But no choice a woman makes is wrong in a situation of danger, Rothenberg said. "A woman does the best she can, she does what she can to survive whether that means submitting to assault or even killing an attacker in a life-threatening situation," she said.

Rothenberg is offering a Women's Self-Defense Workshop at East Street Studios in Hadley on December 11 from 10-1, call 585-1661 to pre-register.

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"One swallow does not make a summer, but too many swallows make a fall."
– Geroge Prentice

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): Other people's dependability is uncertain; safeguard progress by checking important details personally. You shine when doing what you know best. Resist the urge to go on a credit-card-charging binge.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): The best answers will come from within today. Someone may demand too much of you. Comparison shopping unearths real treasures for holiday gift-giving.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): Crossed wires at home will unravel themselves if left alone until tomorrow. Your research spots the key flaw that has caused project delays. ESP or inside information puts you in the driver's seat.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): A verbal or written agreement helps you obtain important support for a project. Remember toy cars are for fun, not work. Romance deepens.

LEO(July 23-Aug. 22): Not everyone gets to enjoy a love pentagon. Celebrate your popularity by inviting the whole crew over for a bash. Go all out; sell the car to finance the festive occasion.

VIRGO(Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Powerful trends on the private level make it easier for you to win special favors or someone's affection. Be open-minded. A young-at-heart attitude makes you popular with people of all ages.

LIBRA(Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Look forward to a day of meaningful discussions and social delights. A romantic duo enjoys superb rapport. The more people you reach out to, the greater your discoveries. Wrap some gifts tonight.

SCORPIO(Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Investing in exercise equipment, office furnishings or a creative hobby gives you a boost. Try and get some rest, despite those who would prefer to keep you from your beauty sleep. Flirtatious relations are always fun.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Take a chance on you won talents this month. Your fresh ideas will rejuvenate a project you felt was lost. A gesture of affection wins back a friend or revives a romance.

CAPRICORN(Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Smarten up; go along with a clever plan. Don't worry about your job performance; you're doing a great job. A recently found close companion brings a smile to your face. Treat that friend well.

AQUARIUS(Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A relationship is tested. You find out just how important someone is to your happiness. Finishing what you start is imperative. Be more practical. Play Sega with friends.

PISCES(Feb. 19-March 20): The events that transpire now bring out your best qualities. You may be sitting on an idea that could catapult you to success. Develop a take-charge mentality and refuse to look back.

some of those slippery silks. B-Squared should take a lesson from mild-mannered John Robic; slow, subtle and steady wins the Cravat King race.

• We had the pleasure of speaking with Springfield Union News sports writer Nick Katz on Turkey Day and instead of The Win, all St. Nick could talk about was how Spider-Man was flying underneath his hotel window. Hey McDermott, you're working the guys too hard over there — they're starting to hallucinate.

• The Bunyon brothers were refereeing the UMass-Trinity hockey game on Tuesday. We thought they had been former wrestlers, but it could have been their father Paul. The Bunyon brothers, Ned and Jeff. I'm really starting to like hockey now.

• You think Coach Cal handles 12 young men well, you should have seen him enthrall 180 adults at yesterday's sports luncheon. Of course my favorite part was The Fabulous Vic's clam chowder. Cal and clam chowder, it's like peanut butter and jelly.

• Quackenbush. That's almost as much fun as oompa.

• Aside from the immortal Quackenbush (say it again, you'll like it), St. Bonaventure also has Robert Palmer on their roster. He does a great "Sneaking With Sally" at halftime.

• Keep it a secret, but I saw Lammy Chance returning his Tar Heel pajamas for a set of Minuteman sweats. Those fickle North Carolinians.

• Lou is a MAN.

[bullet] There is still hope that good things happen to good people when a guy like Mike Hodges gets a four-year deal. A class guy with a class staff who got stiffed by the Div. I-AA playoff committee.

One more football leftover. How does Rene Ingoglia not make first team Yankee Conference? Ingoglia could be starting for the Pats . . . Okay bad example, but you get the point.

• Freaking Marty Dobrow writes a tremendous piece on the 1963 UMass football team for the Hampshire Gazette and some freaking Happy Valley no-lifer writes a freaking letter complaining about one of Marty's adjectives. There is no justice.

• Happy belated birthday to Ellen Calipari, the brains behind the operation.

• The Shirl is very concerned for Marcus and hopes his injury isn't very serious.

The Shirl: Caring for the person, not the player.

• Keep your feet in bounds and your eyes on Rigo.

Exactly one year ago last night, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team faced Northeastern and lost a 64-63 heartbreaker despite the spectacular performance of Melissa Gurile, who tossed in 34 points and snared 13 rebounds in her first collegiate game.

How much difference does a year make? Plenty for the Minutewomen, who faced the same NU squad last night at the Curry Hicks Cage.

Massachusetts rode the 15-point first-half performance of Gurile to a 30-18 halftime lead and managed to hold on in the second to down the Huskies 56-44 and earn its first win of the season.

Northeastern jumped out to an early 7-4 lead because of its strong interior defense which was denying the pass into the paint to both Gurile and Octavia Thomas, who lit up Ohio State for 31 points three days ago.

"We didn't work real hard to get the ball," said Minutewoman Coach Joanie O'Brien. "They were fronting our post players who were waiting for our guards to reverse the ball and get it back to them instead of working to get open."

Massachusetts then reeled off a 14-4 run, sparked by nine points from Gurile, six of them on outside jumpers, to take an 18-11 lead.

Neither team was able to muster much offensively in the half. The Huskies were a paltry 35 percent from the floor and an even worse 33 percent from the line. The Minutewomen weren't much better shooting at a 38 percent clip that could have been worse if not for Gurile's 7-for-12 effort.

"We couldn't get the ball into the blocks," O'Brien said. "You cannot settle for jump shots in this game and win. You have to get the ball inside."

Massachusetts came out ice cold to start the second half, going six minutes without scoring and allowing the Huskies to cut the lead to four at 30-26 before a Gurile jumper at 13:59 got the Minutewomen back on track.

Still, Northeastern would not go away and the Huskies wittled the Massachusetts lead down to one, 34-33, before O'Brien called a time out with 10 minutes left to refocus her team.

"We picked up our defense and switched to man-to-man," O'Brien said. "It was gut check time and that's when you find out how much you want to win the game."

"She told us to play hard and pick it up on defense and that would help our offense," said freshman Beth Kuzmeski, who netted 12 for the Minutewomen, including two three-pointers.

From that point on, Massachusetts established its dominance inside and was able to stretch out its lead. Thomas and freshman Crystal Carroll, who both scored on second-chance baskets, led the charge for the Minutewomen.

"I think the last 12 minutes, Octavia and Crystal started to work hard on the blocks and we were able to get the ball inside and pick up some fouls," O'Brien said.

Foul shooting was key for Massachusetts last night as it was able to convert on its attempts down the stretch, scoring its last 13 points from the charity stripe. For the game, the Minutewomen hit 18-22 for 82 percent from the line.

Defense and sloppy offensive play usually go hand in hand and last night was no exception as the Minutewomen forced 28 Northeastern turnovers and returned the favor by creating 29. "We did a little bit better handling the ball tonight than against Ohio State (33 turnovers)," O'Brien said. "No matter how good your post players are, if you can't handle the ball, you're not going to be successful. That's an area we still need to work on."

An encouraging note for Massachusetts was the fact that starting point guard Tricia Hopson was able to play some quality minutes. Hopson has been hampered by a sprained ankle the last week, but looked strong in her 17 minutes last night.

Hangin' with Governor Weld at Foxborough

What a great marketing idea by the Patriots last Sunday. Combine laundry day with a Jets game. I got about three loads done in the monsoon, but the line for the dryers was crazy.

• I'd venture to guess people would still be strewn about Uptown if The Win had occurred when students were here.

• Excuse me, Mr. Smith your eminence, oh holy one, praised be you, etc., etc. — the young guy with the nice suit and Gucci shoes who shook your hand at around midnight Thanksgiving morning was John Calipari. Please remember the name.

• How did MontrOsstertag get to play for both Kansas and UNC? Is cloning legal in college hoops?

• With Dr. Arthur Pappas performing Marcus Camby's arthroscopy, does that mean he is now part-owner of the Minutemen as well? Can medical cover-ups be far behind? Will the Butcher replace Cal? Is Lou Lou asking, "What would we do with a Rasheed Wallace anyway?"

• This one is too good to believe. My cohorts and I plopped ourselves down behind the Patriots bench on about the 45-yard line under about 45 feet of water and who is sitting one row behind us on the 30? Governor William Weld. The Big Redwood himself. We couldn't resist.

"Dukakis never would have sat through this."

"If for no other reason than today, you have my vote."

The Guv — a man of the people who was just as wet as everyone else and just as discouraged as the drunks next to him.

(Take that, Reiss Lightning. You might have been a ball boy, but I had better seats than the state's Governor.)

Camby's knee tested; results in

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

No. 9 Massachusetts got an early Christmas present yesterday afternoon when it was announced that freshman Marcus Camby may return to action as early as Dec. 27 after undergoing precautionary diagnostic arthroscopic surgery on his right knee.

Camby injured his knee on the first possession of overtime in UMass' 91-86 victory over then No. 1 North Carolina last Wednesday. The initial prognosis was a deep knee bruise but no damage to Camby's anterior cruciate ligament — yesterday's surgery reaffirmed this.

Minuteman Coach John Calipari said that after rehabilitation, the 6-foot-11 center will be back on the court, possibly for the Abdow's Hall of Fame Classic in Springfield when Massachusetts (4-1) hosts a two-day tourney, consisting of Hartford, Hofstra and Maryland.

Assistant Coach James "Bruiser" Flint said he was very happy that Camby probably won't need a knee brace, but said the rehab will be grueling.

"I'm just happy that Marcus is going to be back this year. He probably won't have to wear a brace," said Flint. "Sometimes when you wear those braces, it messes you up psychologically. He won't have to wear the brace, but I know he's going to struggle a little bit, trying to get back as soon as he can."

Camby's rehab will consist of working with Massachusetts Weights and Strength Coach Bob Otrando, trying to get the knee stronger and back into playing form.

"If Marcus keeps getting better, and we keep getting better as a team without him, we're going to have a hell of a club down the road this year," said Flint.

With Camby out of action, the Minutemen have looked to sophomore swingman Donta Bright and junior Jeff Meyer to pick up the slack. So far in the two contests without Camby, both have been a presence. One, Meyer, is giving more than was ever expected, and the other, Bright, is producing exactly what was expected of him before the season began.

Against Kansas, Meyer received the starting nod and played extremely well, plugging up the defensive void left in the paint by the departure of Camby. Calipari said Meyer's game has been outstanding because the 7-foot-2 center knows his limitations.

"Jeff has been outstanding because he has realized he's not meant to play 20-25 minutes a game," said Calipari. "If he can give us good defense and grab rebounds in the 10 to 15 minutes he's in there, that's great."

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

Freshman Marcus Camby received good news yesterday after his surgery in Boston: nothing serious. Camby may return to action as early as December 28 in the Abdow's Hall of Fame Classic.

Bright got the start last Sunday in UMass' 84-83 win over Oklahoma and scored a career-high 28 points. Calipari said that the key for Bright was to realize he finishes the plays; he is not yet a creator. The pupil agreed.

"I just have to do whatever Coach wants. He's the man, so I listen to him," said Bright.

Percussion, strings and all that JAZZ

Max Roach headlines trio of talent at F.A.C.

BY TARA MK CONNELLY ◆ COLLEGIAN STAFF

'Tis the season to be festive, and the Fine Arts Center will kick off the holiday season by presenting to the Pioneer Valley one of the world's greatest trap drummer as well as musical explorer, composer, musicologist, and educator Max Roach.

Tonight at 8 p.m., Roach, accompanied by the New Orchestra of Boston out of MIT, will titillate the senses with the classical sounds of Barber's Adagio for Strings and Mozart's Symphony No. 33 in Bb,K319. These will then be followed by the University of Massachusetts' own contemporary composer Fredrick C. Tillis' Festival for Percussion and Symphony Orchestra.

The evening's program is to be noted for its unique blending of Old World and New World classical composition, giving the audience a chance to see how Classical music has been adapted and interpreted through the decades. It is also a great opportunity to experience first hand a multitude of talent.

Roach is an internationally acclaimed percussionist and composer who opened the door to contemporary American music. For 20 years, Max Roach has performed solo concerts globally and views the American drum set as a symbol of the country's cultural diversity. The cymbals are from the Middle East, the side drums simulate the drums of Africa and Native America, and the snare and bass drums come from a World Music tradition.

"The trap drum set is a complete percussion instrument that is a complete percussion ensemble. To master the instrument one must learn to use both hands and feet independently to create layers of rhymthic patterns at the

Some ska-core madness from Murphy's Law

By MATT AUDETTE
Collegian Correspondent

The floor may rumble and the walls may shake in the Student Union Ballroom tonight, but don't worry, it's only "ska-core madness," as the hyperactive Murphy's Law and ska legends, The Toasters, take the stage.

Hailing from the Big Apple, Murphy's Law burst onto the scene in 1983, quickly establishing themselves as one of the wildest, no holds barred, live acts on the punk circuit. Playing sold out shows at New York's CBGB's to more than enthusiastic crowds, the band's rowdy reputation rapidly grew.

Soon they released their eponymous debut on Profile Records and nabbed the opening slot on the Beastie Boys' infamous License To Ill tour, sharing the stage with Fishbone as well as the then unknown Public Enemy.

The excessive touring paid off as the band released their sophomore effort Back With A Bong in 1988, adding more dimensions to their music by incorporating elements of ska and funk to the already lethal punk throttle (as well as their outspoken love for Mother Nature's favorite herb).

College radio quickly embraced the single "Ska Song" and before they knew it the band was opening for the likes of The Red Hot Chili Peppers and punk legends The Ramones.

Taking the best elements of Back With A Bong one step further, the band recorded their third release The Best Of Times in 1991, firmly securing their seat in the punk/ska/funk hall of fame. With members of Fishbone at the production helm, the album traveled all over the stylistic map while retaining the chaotic energy of the band's live performances.

With their "just have fun" attitude and uncontrollable energy, Murphy's Law promise to put on a show that even the fussiest music fan can get into.

"[The show] is for everybody," says lead singer Jimmy Drescher. "From frat dudes, to Deadheads, to punk rockers to metalheads. When we have a show, we don't want it to be a show so much as a party."

Sharing the bill with Murphy's Law are cult favorites The Toasters. Already an established favorite among ska fiends, they are best known for their hyper-kinetic live shows and dedication to the music they love. The band has put out its own albums on founding guitarist Rob Hingley's label Moon Records for the last eight years, but regrettably has been overlooked by all the major labels.

"I think that in [major labels] minds, ska has already been done. On the other hand, bands like The Mighty Mighty Bosstones and Fishbone [are] getting signed. For us it's more like a hard luck story, but we don't really mind at this point," Hingley told Reflex magazine.

Even without the support of a major label, The Toasters still have managed to sell out venues all over the country proving that ska is not dead, and that even in the age of MTV and computer generated music there is still a demand for great live bands.

Local favorites Knuckle Sandwich open the show with their self-proclaimed brand of "funky-folky-skankin'-punk" music.
The band cites various influences including "'80s cheese rock, episodes of the A-Team, and Duran Duran."

If that's not worth the price of admission alone, I don't know what is.

Piano is adult fairy tale

Glorious, romantic melodrama shines

The Piano, like all of cinema's great romances, enraptures one in an angelic trance that it seems downright dangerous to break its spell. The work of a true film artist, Jane Campion's glorious romantic melodrama is a grand adult fairy tale, filled with one arresting, jaw-dropping image after another. From the treacherous but serenely gorgeous New Zealand islands to the warm tips of the ivory keys, The Piano is a supremely engrossing love story — a visual and emotional triumph.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Holly Hunter gives a stellar performance as Ada, a woman who communicates only through sign language, in Piano

THE REEL WORLD
by Jon Lupo

Holly Hunter, in a landmark performance that transcends even the most gushing hyperbole, portrays Ada, a woman who, by choice, has not spoken since she was six opting to communicate through sign language, little notes she keeps around her neck, and most passionately, through her piano.

Married off by her father to an island farmer (Jurassic Park's Sam Neill), she is sent with daughter Flora (Anna Paquin) and piano in tow from Scotland to the jagged coast of New Zealand. The island natives, paid cheaply by the white settlers, cannot carry Hunter's piano across the rugged terrain. Baines, a fellow farmer who bares the marks of the Maori natives trades Hunter's piano for some land and will only allow Hunter to play in exchange for lessons.

Caught in a web of emotional blackmail, Ada is slowly seduced by Baines, whose unadulterated lust for Ada evolves into pure love. Splintered by jealousy, Neill can only understand their love through his own unrequited feelings for Ada. When this passion-filled cauldron eventually boils over, rage becomes poetic tragedy and finally, just poetry.

At the center of this emotional maelstrom lies the cool, fierce beauty of Hunter's amazingly perceptive performance. Stripped of the plucky accent that led her to accolades in 1987's Broadcast News and this summer's The Firm, Hunter has been set free to explore the deepest confines of her character. Hunter's face, ragged but deceptively luminous, is her all-telling canvas, and she more than rises to the challenge.

Harvey Keitel, too, breaks away from past characterizations, investing his romantic hero with a sensuous grace only hinted at before. Mysterious but never dangerous, there is an innate gentleness which Keitel fosters with evident care here, and his performance is a wonder of textured grace.

What is most remarkable is how Neill, in the somewhat shadowy role as the film's proverbial third wheel, remains sympathetic throughout the film. All three characters are individuals living through a quietly destructive torment. Neill, in a role that could've easily descended into one-dimensional villainy, creates a character full of pathos in a world he cannot understand.

Writer-director Campion (An Angel at My Table) deftly blends her obvious feminist slant with a penetrating portrait of each character's evolving humanity. Even Campion's sometimes skin-deep symbolism attains a regal beauty. The Piano's wonderful score, provided by Peter Greenaway vet Michael Nyman (and played by Hunter herself), strikes the perfect balance between the asperously lush landscape and the characters' very souls.

As perfect as any romance can be, The Piano is more than a must-see for the art-house crowd or a purple Harlequin romance, but a genuine romantic wonder. Campion's loving and seductively sublime imagery, coupled with a trio of unconventionally radiant performances, makes The Piano sing a haunting, and unforgettable melody. A (Academy of Music)

WEEKEND HAPPENINGS

The Weekend Happenings calendar is printed each Thursday during the academic year. Groups wishing to have an event published may send a press release containing all necessary information to the Arts & Living Editor, 113 Campus Center. The Collegian regrets that, due to space constraints, not all submissions can be published.

THURSDAY

CONCERT— Max Roach, acclaimed as the world's finest trap drummer, will perform the regional premier of Frederick Tillis' "A Festival Journey for Percussion and Symphony Orchestra" at the Fine Arts Center. The show will begin at 8 p.m. and tickets are $11 with half price for Five College Students. For tickets or more information call the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545-2511.

DANCE— The University Dancers will perform "Dancing Up A Storm" in Bowker Auditorium at the University of Massachusetts. Co-sponsored by WFCR FM, this 17-member dance company, comprised of students as well as faculty, will present works done in, and incorporating, modern, jazz and ballet. Tickets are $7 for the general public, $4 for students, $2 for seniors and children. Showtime is 8 p.m. This show will also run Nov. 3 and and Nov. 4. Reservations are recommended.

THEATER— "Pericles; Prince of Tyre," will be presented at the Rand Theater, Fine Arts Center, UMass. This Shakespearean piece is known as his most amiable portrait of the relationship between father and daughter, with kidnapping, murder and the high seas as a backdrop. It is directed by Michael Tritto, a directing student who has worked with Shakespeare and Co., Lenox, MA. Showtime is 8 p.m. Tickets are $5.50 for the general public and $3.50 for students. This show will also run Nov. 3 and Nov. 4.

CONCERT— The Toasters and Murphy's Law, with special guest Knuckle Sandwich, will be at the Student Union Ballroom, UMass, to provide a night of foot stompin' and funkin' for all those ready to rock out. This UPC Production will begin at 8 p.m. Tickets are $6 for UMass students and $8 for all other funky monks. Tickets are available at TIX Unlimited, For the Record and Main Street Records.

THEATER— "Danny and the Deep Blue Sea," directed by Erika Czerwinski, will be performed at the Studio Theater, Emily Dickinson Hall, Hampshire College. Showtime is 8 p.m. Tickets are $3 general admission and $2.50 for students. For more information call the Box Office at 582-5351. This show will also run Nov. 3, Nov. 4, and Nov. 5.

CONCERT— Joel Krosnick, cellist, and Gilbert Kalish, pianist, will perform an all-Beethoven concert, Buckley Recital Hall, Amherst College, 8 p.m. There will be a pre-concert lecture and demonstration by Lewis Lockwood, of Harvard University, on Beethoven's op. 102 Sonatas. 7 p.m. Admission will be charged for the concert. For more information call 542-2195.

VISUAL ART— There will be an opening reception for the 14th Annual Graduate Student Group Show, Hampden Gallery, UMass. 5-7 p.m. Admission is free.

CONCERT— Peter Lehndorff, a comic folkster, will perform at the Black Sheep Cafe, 8 p.m. Admission is $3. The Black Sheep is located on Main Street, Amherst Center.

FRIDAY

THEATER— "Dancing at Lughnasa," by Irish playwright Brian Friel, will be presented at Theater 14, Mendenhall Center, Smith College. With other works such as "Philadelphia, Here I Come" and "Faith Healer," Friel creates an image of his childhood in a devoutly Catholic world where daily toil is redeemed by romance and dance. Showtime is 8 p.m. Tickets are $4 for the general public and $2 for students and seniors. This show will also run Nov. 4 and Nov. 5.

THEATER— Student Valley Productions will present the comedy troupe Mission: IMPROVable. Mission features artists who take ideas for the script from the audience, which brings improvisational comedy to its pinnacle. Showtime is 8 p.m., Campus Center, UMass. Ask as the Information Desk for the room number. Admission is a donation of non-perishable food items, going to the Western Mass. Food Bank.

THEATER— Playwrights in Progress will feature two one-act plays by Amherst playwrights Brian Egan, presenting "Margaret Denehy To The Rescue," and Herschel S. Shohan, with "George Bush is My Father." Both plays deal with two aspects of a typically American story with both tragic and comic overtones: the often traumatizing conflict between ethnic fathers and their grown Americanized children. Showtime is 8 p.m. at the East Street Theater, East Street, South Hadley. Tickets are $5 and $4 for seniors and students. This show will also run Nov. 4.

MUSICAL— Amherst Leisure Services will present the family event of the season, the production "Oliver," a musical version of Dickens' play "Oliver Twist." To be held at the Amherst Junior High School Auditorium, 8 p.m. Also, Nov. 4 there will be a matinee at 2 p.m., as well as a showing at 8 p.m., with another matinee at 2 p.m. on Nov. 5. Tickets are $7 for adults and $5 for children and can be purchased at the Jones Library and Lots for Littles.

CONCERT— "Romanticism Past and Present," featuring the works of Rachmaninoff, Debussy and Faure, will be presented by Gilbert Kalish and Joel Krosnick. Buckley Recital Hall, Amherst College, 8 p.m. Tickets are $12 for the general public, $8 for five-college students, and $5 for Amherst College students.

CONCERT— yeP! will peform at the first-ever rock show at The Shea Theater in Turners Falls. Don't miss this 7:30 show, $5 in advance, $6 at the door.

Envy balances enchantment and angry raves

Eve's Plum
Epic

A cross between serial killers and babysitters. A mixture of baby powder and gun powder. These are the images that Colleen Fitzpatrick conjured up to describe the sound of her band Eve's Plum new album, envy. She juxtaposes her enchanting voice with angry raves throughout the album while remaining a guitar-driven album.

We all suffered and enjoyed the Brady Bunch reruns when we were younger and can all remember tortured Jan Brady, who wasn't the oldest or the youngest, but was just there. This envy has offered one of Epic's new bands their appropriate band name.

"That's how Colleen came up with the title envy," said bassist Chris Giammalvo. "I mean, we've all been envious of people at some time, or been envied by someone else. It's a very powerful feeling — it's both resentment and desire. But we don't consider this a dark album."

The band is made up of the Kotch twins, Michael on guitar and Ben on drums, stunning Colleen Fitzpatrick on vocals (Jan Brady's alter ego resurfaced) and Chris Giammalvo on bass. Although Colleen's voice strengthens and complements the rest of the band, it is Michael's fiery control of the six string that highlights the work.

Michael and Ben had played together for years when they happened upon Colleen and Chris through a Village Voice classified. Fate got them started, but Eve's Plum has gathered quite a following on the New York club scene.

In an interview with Colleen in October, she said she "was never much of a music junkie." She said her interests remain '70s culture and fashion and said they may even do a cover of Gloria Gaynor's "I Will Survive" on their current tour.

"We've toured with Gumball, Eleven and the Posies," she said, "but I'm really a big Abba fan."

Her major stage influences are apparent in Kim Gordon of Sonic Youth and Deborah Harry of Blondie. But Colleen doesn't see equilibrium yet for women in the music industry despite recent successes of Belly or the Breeders.

"It just hasn't been exploited before," she said of the issue of women's role in the business.

The first single off envy was kind of a surprise to the band because it was "less radio friendly" than other possible singles. But the single, "Blue," epitomizes the sound of Eve's Plum from the quick riffs of Michael to the contrasting voices of Colleen, docile and demure, rising to the feverish angst of "feel me, feel me, watch me turn blue."

"Blue is what the band is like live," said Colleen.

Other highlights on the album include "Lovely You" and "Kiss Your Feet," two of the slower, rising works that hypnotize you with Colleen's lullaby voice. "Believable" is another that will be captivating and hard-hitting live.

The next possible single off the album is also arguably the best song on the album. "Die Like Someone" is one of the more crafted and produced songs but it is not overly done. It highlights Michael's talent for riffs, as well as including some of his guttier and longer solos.

Eve's Plum will be back to the New York and Boston areas soon if you want to catch an energized and exciting show. The album itself deserves a spot in any alternative music collection, but anyone can find a couple of favorites on this album. B same time," explains Roach.

Throughout his illustrious career, Roach has collaborated with a diverse number of well-known musicians such as Miles Davis, Sam Shepard, Dizzy Gellespie, the Boston Pops with John Williams, and Charlie Parker.

Not only is Roach known for his musical talent, but also for his role as an educator and mentor for many promising musicians.

In 1983, Max Roach was awarded a MacArthur Foundation Fellowship in recognition for his distinguished contributions to American cultural life. Roach has also received the Eagle Award from the National Music Council and the Samuel Rosenbaum Award from the National Guild of Community Schools of the Arts due to his life long dedication to music education.

Roach has also been a frequent guest lecturer and speaker at UMass, doing numerous free concerts and demonstrations of his marvelous talent to further educate and interest students in Jazz, Blues, and Classical music.

The New Orchestra of Boston that will accompany Roach has been cited by Boston music critic David Noble as, "Probably the best alternative orchestra since it's inception." Founded in 1984, the MIT-based ensemble decided to dedicate themselves to bringing music of first rate performance to communities who are able to view some of the country's major orchestras.

The Orchestra is conducted by David Epstein, who has conducted the Cleveland Orchestra, The Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the American symphony Orchestra. He has been cited by Leipzig's music press as, "one of the leading interpreters of Romantic music in his generation."

Tillis' piece was originally commissioned by the Atlanta Symphony Orchestra, that held a concert at UMass in February. Tillis is presently the director of the Fine Arts Center, Professor of Music Composition, and director of the Afro-American Music and Jazz program at UMass.

Tillis was nominated by the students for the 1992-93 Distinguished Teaching Award, and in 1980, was named Distinguished Lecturer by the Chancellor of UMass. As a poet and writer, he has published several books of poems and a textbook on Jazz Theory.

Tickets for the concert start at $11 with half price tickets for Five College Students, $8 for children 16 and under. For more information call the Fine Arts Center at 545-2511.

Dynamic duo to hit Pearl St.

Squeeze teams up with Paul Carrack

By JAMIE D. BEARSE
Collegian Staff

The sands of the "hourglass" that have counted five years since Squeeze last hit the stage will cease to pour when the band comes to Pearl Street, with opening band Over The Rhine this Sunday at 7 p.m.

Sunday will mark the first time the Valley will hear new music from Squeeze since the band last cracked the Top 40 with "853-5937/Angela." The British/Australian band's history dates back to 1978, when they hit mainstream in America with "Take Me I'm Yours."

The band originally formed in England when Chris Difford teamed up with then co-lead singer of the Split Enz, Glenn Tilbrook. When the band broke up in 1988, Tilbrook met up with former Split Enz member Neil Finn to sing back up on 1991 Crowded House Album, Woodface.

This time around, Difford and Tilbrook have reunited with former lead vocalist Paul Carrack for the new tour and album. Carrack, best known as the lead singer for Mike & The Mechanics in the mid '80s, has also been absent from the music scene since 1989, when he released a solo LP, "Groove Approved." With Mike & The Mechanics, Carrack hit No. 1 with the singles, "All I Need is a Miracle" and "In the Living Years."

Carrack teamed up with Squeeze in 1981 to record two of the band's biggest hits, "Is That Love" and "Tempted."

The show has all the makings to be a block-buster which should include Paul Carrack's solo hits "How Long" and "Battlefield."

Tickets are on sale for $15 at Strawberries, Ticket Pro (800) 828-7080 and at the Northampton Box Office, 586-8686.

Craft center to hold fair

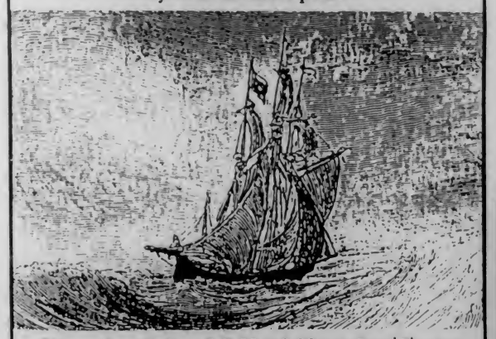
STEVEN PEDULLA / COLLEGIAN
A variety of crafts will be available today and tomorrow on the Campus Center Concourse.

By GEORGIA PAPADOPOULOU
Collegian Correspondent

The Craft Center of the University of Massachusetts will present its Annual Holiday Craft Fair on the Lincoln Campus Center Concourse from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. today and tomorrow.

The Craft Fair is a fund-raising event for the Craft Center, and features professional artists from around the New England area, as well as UMass students, exhibiting their work.

The event is open to the public so that people can go and view or purchase different kinds of crafted items such as candles, dry flowers, wreaths, old maps, gargoile sculptures, petite clothing (T-shirts and winter wear), pottery, jewelry made of silver, brass, and bronze and many more.



Susan Bourque, the Director of the Craft Center said that this event is sponsored by the Student Union Craft Center, which is a nonprofit organization dedicated to enriching student campus life by providing a crafts facility, tools and instruction in an enjoyable and relaxing environment.

"I'd like more UMass students to know about us, so they could come and have some fun," says Bourque.

The Craft Center has been functioning for more than 25 years, and gets funds from the Student Activities Fee. The Center offers some of the best facilities in the country, sporting equipment worth $100,000, which is completely compiled of students' investments from the previous years.

If you are passing through the Campus Center within the next two days, don't forget to stop at the Craft Fair, because, as Bourque points out, "There's still time to make holiday gifts."

The Student Union Craft Center is located on the UMass campus just across from the Hatch. It is open on Monday - Friday 10 a.m. - 5 p.m. For more information call 545-2096.

Black Sheep revitalized by live entertainment

By BETH GOLSTEIN
Collegian Staff

If you've never heard of a French Kiss sandwich, made of truffle pate, red onion and dijon mustard on a baguette, then you've never been to the Black Sheep deli and bakery.

Besides providing more than 25 unique sandwich choices for lunch, the Black Sheep always has at least 20 mouth-watering desserts, an abundance of prepared dishes on display and a variety of flavored coffees and packaged specialty foods. What's more, this list is not even half of the tasty items available to Black Sheep customers.

"We're crazy for what we do here," said Nick Seamon, owner of the Black Sheep.

Seamon has experimented with novelty gourmet ideas since he first opened his restaurant eight years ago, but lately he has decided to try something new: namely, live entertainment.

Since April of this year, the Black Sheep has featured live musicians Thursday through Saturday nights and at Sunday brunches. Seamon says he has always wanted to provide live entertainment for his customers, but he never had the room. In 1992, when he also started renting the building next door, he was finally able to fulfill his wishes.

Now there is a long, green curtain that separates the original cafe from the lounge. The new area is equipped with 10 round, tiny tables accompanied by chairs, whose wired backs form large hearts and face a small stage that stands about six inches off of the floor.

For Seamon, running a restaurant alone is hard enough, but running a restaurant with live musicians alone is impossible. He called on his uncle, Kevin Weyle, to manage the entertainment scene.

"Kevin does the sound check, takes money at the door and feeds the band," said Seamon, who added that Weyle also conducts the auditions and chooses the performers.

Having been a travelling musician for 25 years, Weyle knows what it's like to be in the music business, even though he is on the other side of the exchange now. According to Seamon, Weyle's empathy for the musicians is what keeps them coming back, since they are not exactly playing for record-breaking crowds.

"We're different in some ways because we put the musicians first," said Seamon. "Kevin and I really want this to be a special place to play for musicians.

According to Seamon, the performers receive 75 per cent of the ticket profits and a complimentary dinner. On early Thursday evenings and Sunday brunches, the performers play for only the complimentary meal.

Seamon looks at the new setup as a way to provide the community with something other than the common bar scene, laden with loud dance music and pitchers of beer.

"There's no non-smoking cafe in the area," Seamon said, adding that if the audience desires cocktail, it should be obtained before the show.

The cafe owner also looks at the decision to feature live entertainment as a business move, trying to bring more people in at nighttime, since the cafe remains open until 11 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday evenings.

"We're always looking for other reasons for people to come here," he said. "Our hope is you'll come to the show and try something, and realize it's good food and come back."

Seamon is satisfied with the new scene. He says on a good night, which is usually one of the three evenings featuring a musical guest, the place will pack about 30 people. On the slower nights, there will be anywhere from 15-20 people.

Some of the people that come to the cafe at night are the regulars during the day, but Seamon says it is hard to tell, since there is such a diverse group of people during the day.

"We have a very varied clientele," said Seamon, "as varied as you can get."

According to Seamon, the people who come for the night-time entertainment average 35-40 years of age, a more mature crowd than the bars in the center of town usually have.

Looking to the future, he says he would love to have "a big name" in his cafe someday. He has a favorite folk guitarist whom he knows would draw a large crowd. If he does have a popular musician play at his restaurant, he would have two shows in one night, in order to accommodate a big audience, and in order to pay off the musician.

Seamon realizes, however, that he has to have patience because it will take a while for him to reach the point where he can invite popular musicians.

"It's a slow build," he acknowledged, proposing a truth that can be applied to many things that are worth working hard and waiting for.

Attention Arts/Living staff members:

If you are of staff status, do not miss candidates' night on Sunday, Dec. 5, at 7:30 in the Collegian business office. Candidates for the Arts/Living Editor position will be available to answer questions and address issues and concerns.

Also, do not miss your opportunity to rock the vote on Tuesday, Dec. 7 from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. at 113 Campus Center. Your voice counts, and your contribution to the Arts/Living page is welcome.

Minority program captures funding

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts was awarded $600,000 by the Balfour Foundation for partnership and funding for the next three years of the Springfield/UMass Minority Achievement Program (SUMMA). It is a program designed to provide minority students in the Springfield School system, to increase minority enrollment and to improve campus race relations. The program is planned to outreach other UMass schools in Boston, Lowell, and Worcester.

In accordance with $100,000 grant by Chancellor Scott, an additional $100,000 from President Hooker and a $60,000 award from the High Education Coordinating council, SUMMA will be enabled to run for the next four years by the Institute for Advanced Sundy in Humanities. Also, UMass will annually contribute $83,000 to the SUMMA budget.

SUMMA began this fall and contracts with Hispanic students and guarantees them admission to the university if they complete the college preparatory program. Next semester the program will open up to African-American and Asian students.

According to The Boston Globe, in New England blacks represent about 4.4 percent of the population and in 1990 only 2.7 percent have a B.A. Hispanics are only 4.3 percent with 1.8 percent having degrees (Study by New England Board of Higher Education).

SUMMA is designed to keep children from the area from dropping out of high school, getting them involved with the university, helping them attain the skills they need to get into college, and taking academic classes rather than general diplomas.

The program will try to halt an ever increasing drop out rate for minority students that believe that they don't have any options by the time they attend high school.

SUMMA will sponsor regular trips to campus in order to teach them a familiarity and eventually enroll them in the university. Robert Wolff, co-director of the Bilingual Collegiate Program, and professor in the Afro-American department called the campus outreach visits a chance for the kids to "call UMass their turf."

Ilona Lagowski, a TEAMS (Tutoring Enrichment Assistance Models for Schools) tutor believes that the program is an important factor for the minority students in Springfield. TEAMS is a program designed for fostering relationships and promoting multicultural understanding through tutors for culturally and linguistically diverse students.

"They think college is so far out of reach that it is an unrealistic goal," said Lagowski who teaches 16-21 year old students, the majority of which have dropped out of school. "I tell them that they can go to college - that is when they start opening up." Like TEAMS, SUMMA also is a mentor program with university students to serve as tutors to the children in Springfield.

150 Hispanic students have joined SUMMA and by the end of the year

SUB concert marred by brawl, police action

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

Two concertgoers were arrested and numerous people suffered from sore eyes and throats last night when a melee broke out after New York based band Murphy's Law finished their performance in the Student Union Ballroom.

Alex Johnson, a former University of Massachusetts student and an unidentified male were arrested after UMass police broke up a fight between the two. Police sprayed a substance at Johnson believed to be mace which quickly dispersed into the air, causing shortness of breath and eye irritation in the crowd of about 400.

Tension began when hardcore/ska band Murphy's Law's lead singer Jimmy Gestapo took exception to a pro-Aryan patch on the flight jacket of an audience member. Gestapo left the stage and confronted the man saying he didn't want violence but opposed the man's political views.

While a few crowd members exchanged angry words and shoves, no violence occurred at the time.

"If I was going to have violence [I'd do it myself]," said Gestapo. "He stressed his ignorant views."

Gestapo returned to the stage and incorporated anti-Nazi statements into the next song.

Soon after completion of the band's performance, a brawl involving Johnson and the man with the pro-Aryan patch, started in the rear of the Ballroom. While police separated those involved, one officer sprayed the unidentified substance in Johnson's face. The two men were arrested. Police were unavailable for comment.

Moments later, crowd members began coughing and most of the crowd left the ballroom and went outside the Student Union or remained in the lobby. EMTs were seen instructing those having trouble breathing to go outside.

John Stahl, a Holyoke Community College student, said, "All [the man with the patch] could say was that he was proud of his race."

"He helps government by separating all of us. He wants to be a martyr for his race," said Gestapo of the man with the pro-Aryan patch.

Mindy Peden, Promotions Director for University Productions and Concerts, the organizers of the show which also featured the bands Knuckle Sandwich and the Toasters, said she hoped this sort of occurence would bear negatively on UPC or its future events.

Michael Stern, a UMass communications major in the Ballroom at the time of the incident described the police's use of the unidentified substance as "needless."

'Most wanted man' Escobar finally slain

BOGOTA, Columbia (AP) — Security forces killed drug lord Pablo Escobar in Medellin on Thursday, ending a 16 month hunt for one of the most wanted men in the world.

Police and soldiers shot Escobar dead at a shopping mall in the heart of the city that served as the base for his cocaine empire, according to local radio reports. The death was confirmed by the country's prosecutor general.

Escobar was killed by members of a 3,000-man police and army force that had hunted for him since he escaped from prison in July 1992. The United States and Columbia had offered $8.7 million for his capture.

There were unconfirmed reports that another person was slain in Thursday's operation by security forces. No details were available.

"It's a triumph of law over crime," said Andres Pastrana, a prominent Columbian senator.

"Escobar ended up being a symbol of violence and narco-terrorism," Pastrana said. "Now the country can begin to live more peacefully."

Just three days ago, the drug lord's wife and two children flew to Germany seeking political asylum, but Boon rejected their application.

The family, which has been targeted by a vigilante group, returned to Bogota and were staying in a luxury hotel under army protection.

The vigilante group is believed to be composed of members of the rival Cali drug cartel, disenchanted former Medellin cartel members and police avenging the deaths of officers slain by the cartel.

Bill allows photographing of speeders

BOSTON (AP) — Massachusetts drivers who run red lights or speed could find themselves on candid camera under a bill approved by a legislative committee on Wednesday.

The American Automobile Association opposes the bill, which would allow communities to install cameras at intersections and along roads. Vehicles that go through red lights at camera-equipped intersections would trip electronic sensors, prompting cameras to snap pictures.

"People put up with cameras every day, whether in the bank or in the store or being photographed when they apply for a job. It's a fact of life," said Rep. Paul Caron, D-Springfield, a co-sponsor of the bill and co-chairman of the Public Safety Committee.

Motorists going more than 15 mph above speed limits would be photographed by roadside cameras connected to radar guns. All photos would be of the rear of offending vehicles, which would be traced through license plates.

Copies of the photographs would be mailed with traffic tickets to vehicle owners. Civil fines of $50 would be assessed, but points would not be charged against the owner's auto insurance. Tickets could be appealed.

"If people take chances and disobey traffic rules and regualtions, then that's a cause for concern, and we should act," Caron said.

The cameras would be installed and maintained by private companies, which generally would get 40

State responsible for high prices, says SGA

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

After recently winning their campaign to restore partial litigation rights to the Legal Services Office, the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association vowed its next task would be to fight any further University tuition and fee increases at the SGA meeting Wednesday night.

The SGA also passed a motion to condemn the state legislators who have cut the state's appropriation of money to the UMass five college system.

"This motion is a good start," said Senator Charles Lenchner. "People in Boston have been laughing at us, saying 'How come students aren't crying? We've been slashing their budget and they don't do anything about it'."

Lenchner said students are being forced to borrow too much money in order to be able to afford UMass.

"The state legislators who graduated from here in the '60s didn't have to pay as much as we have to pay," he said. "It's not fair for them to say, 'Sorry, the budget cuts are too large, we can't help you.' We are paying too much money for an education that doesn't deserve it."

The SGA plans to form a coalition of students to help persuade the State Higher Education Coordinating Committee (HECC), the committee which decides how much the University's tuition will increase, to not increase tuition any more.

SGA Speaker Matt Pavesi said the SGA's goal of convincing the HECC not to raise tuition is attainable, but the SGA will be opposed in its efforts by Gov. William Weld.

"Last year HECC voted to have a two percent increase in tuition, but we were one vote away from making it a zero percent increase," said Pavesi. "Weld wants the additional income to [offset] his tax cuts."

Pavesi also warned that if the state appropriation for the UMass system is insufficient again, the University will suffer in several academic areas.

"The budget for fiscal year '94 was $317 million, about $22 million short of what we needed," he said. "If we are short again for fiscal year '95, the School of Nursing will disappear, the History department will be cut because there will not be enough TAs, and classes of 50 people will turn into classes of 100."

Pavesi also said the University is recruiting out-of-state students at the expense of the poorer, in-state students.

"I don't mind that 21 percent of the University comes from out of state," he said. "But there should also be 20 percent of the students from the poorer sections of Massachusetts, like Holyoke. Right now there are more students at UMass from Rochester, New York than from Roxbury, Massachusetts."

Pavesi said UMass President Michael K. Hooker is to blame for the bulk of the high cost of attending UMass.

"If you are going to put the blame on one person, you should put it on Michael Hooker," Pavesi said. "Hooker, Weld and the Board of Trustees are defenders of the upper class, they don't care about the poor. If Weld had his way, it would cost $20,000 to come to UMass."

Mather offers wealth of job opportunities

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

True, many say the Mather Career Center is many miles away from campus. True, people also say it is inconvenient to get up there and yes, many people say they do not know where it is.

But to those who are looking for co-ops, internships and jobs, there are two words to keep in mind, networking and opportunities. This is what the Mather Career Center can offer and students are not taking advantage of it.

The Field Experience program at the Mather Career Center helps students with their resumes and has a library filled with information about companies who offer co-ops and internships for the summer and both the fall and spring semesters.

Students can earn money doing co-ops and earn credits for their major through internships. Opportunities such as the David Letterman show and the Boston Globe are being offered for this spring semester. There is only one problem involved, no students are applying for the positions.

"The Field Experience is a great program and students are not taking advantage of it. A lot of co-ops are available for the spring semester. Summer internships are very competitive. The companies at this point are begging for the spring semester," said Jeffrey Silver, assistant director of the Mather Career Center.

"Right now there are five positions for every applicant for co-ops and twenty positions for every applicant for internships," Silver said.

The spring co-ops offer opportunities such as getting contacts and networking. Spending an entire semester with a company can also lead to permanent jobs. Co-ops are always paid. The pay ranges from $10-$12 an hour.

What I am seeing through the co-ops is that students are getting experience through these fields and they are getting references," Silver said.

Social changes in El Salvador

Stanford professor addresses the proposed solutions

By JUAN JOSE CHACON QUIROS
Collegian Staff

It's been almost two years since the government of El Salvador and the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front signed a peace agreement. The revolutionary war is over but the war against underdevelopment has just started.

Elisabeth Jean Wood, a professor in the department of Political Science in Stanford University, addressed this issue at the Economic History and Development workshop, yesterday in Thompson Hall.

Her presentation entitled "The transformation of Agrarian Social Relations and the prospects for Economic Development in El Salvador," praised the negotiated resolution. "It addressed in detail one of the two causes of the conflict, the closed nature of the political system," said Wood.

However, she expressed skepticism about the outcome of this process: "is democracy sustainable in El Salvador after the human rights observers leave and international reconstruction funds dry up?"

Wood explained how the agrarian social relations inside the country have changed. Moreover, a modernizing group of the elite has emerged. "The landlords came out of agriculture and into agro-industrial processing...and the emergent modernizing sector of the elite want business as usual," Wood said.

The transformation of agrarian relations, according to Wood, also included peasant political mobilization, renegotiation of labor relations and unprecedented levels of peasant organization. Wood identified four changes that shaped the transformation of agrarian relations: "the agrarian class structure was changed...the de facto transferral of property rights...the retreat of the landlords...and the influx of remittances."

The second part of workshop focused in the relationship between agrarian transitions, economic development and democracy. According to Wood "the prospects of economic development and democracy are mutually interdependent." She explained how the construction of local democratic institutions "where the new social relations can be reproduced as everyday practices," is a necessary aspect of development and democracy.

In her final statement, Wood said there are three key issues for the normalization of agrarian institutions: "the legalization of property rights, the consolidation of peasant organizations and the consolidation of political parties."

Author discusses transgender

Leslie Feinberg, well-reknowned author and speaker, presented "IN OUR OWN VOICE: A Visual History of Transgender Oppression," last night to a group of approximately 200 people. In a program organized by the UMass Program for Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Concerns, Feinberg gave a rousing talk about transgender relations and their role in history.

Using a slide format Feinberg spoke about the transgender roles of both men and women in western societies, eastern societies, and developing nations.

In an obvious statement of personal identity, Feinberg requested that the word s/he be used in press rather than a gendered he or she.

The slides and accompanying speech were warmly welcomed by the audience of mostly women. Feinberg showed a variety of slides chronicling the roles of 1,000 are expected to be enrolled. Minority students only consist of 2,025 of the undergraduates, 11.8 percent of the student body. According to Rodriguez, SUMMA is coordinated to improve race relations and to create multiculturalism at the University.

In a statement to The Globe, Peter J. Negroni, the superintendent of Springfield called SUMMA: "Dropout prevention at its absolute best. This is a way to give kids some vision of the future."

"It is amazing how many of the parents have become involved," said Rodriguez. Parents also attend the campus tours and eat with the students when they visit the campus and see university life. "These students never dreamed that they could attend a university. This is showing them that they can."

SUMMA includes a tutorial program in academic classes that are important to a college preparatory curriculum such as Science, Math, and English. While attending the University the students attend seminars and classes taught by senior faculty.

"This program is for everybody," said Rodriquez. "It is for anybody that has ever dreamed of attending the university that thought that they couldn't. We don't discriminate against anybody. We want this to be for anyone who needs it."

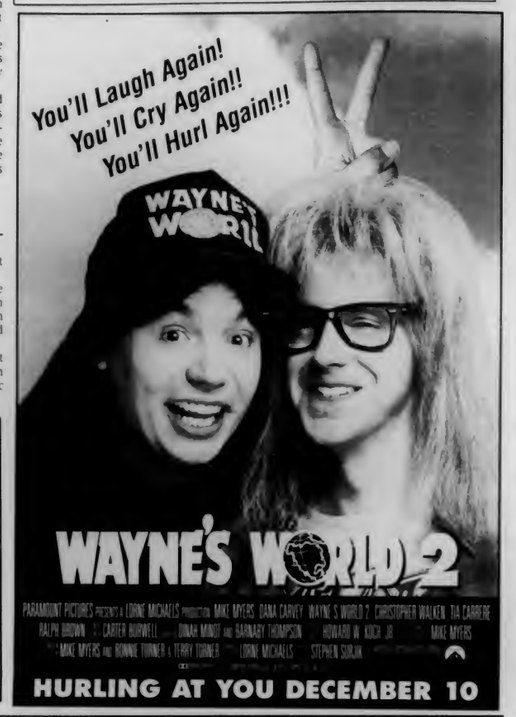
percent of fines collected, Caron said. The remaining money would go to police departments to hire more officers and buy equipment.



Highway officials say 30 percent of accidents in Massachusetts happen at intersections, and two-thirds of them are caused by motorists running red lights.

Traffic Safety Systems Inc. of Winchester demonstrated the camera system last March in Somerville and last June in Springfield. Tickets were not issued in the demonstrations.

An average of 40 drivers a day were caught ignoring the traffic signal on Mystic Avenue by the Fellsway in Somerville, which has been designated the state's most dangerous intersection.

An average of 80 motorists a day went through red lights at an intersection on Boston Road in Springfield, Traffic Safety Systems Inc. said.

There's too much ahead to go down without a fight

I was reading the paper the other day when I came across a kid I used to go to school with. The reason he was in the paper — he committed suicide.

I wasn't good friends with this guy; actually I never even met him. What bothered me was that he was younger than me and had decided to end his life before it really started.

I can tell you right now — if you're looking for the feel-good column of the year, this ain't it. This is serious stuff, a matter of life and death, you might say.

Life doesn't always seem to make sense. I think that's assumed. In fact, it can be pretty cruel sometimes. Growing up isn't the easiest thing in the world to do.

I don't know of one person who didn't have at least one devastating problem in high school or college. I know I had my share.

Just when I thought this maturation stuff was easy, along comes a run of bad luck this September that made me absolutely miserable. Anyone who's read my self-pity column in October knows what I'm talking about.

My friends have their neuroses too. It gets pretty tough to hear people tell you their problems day in and day out when you've got your own stuff to deal with. You get the impression that there's no good in the world, only pain and grief.

This university, at least as I've found, is very negative as well. For the first few years of my stay, there seemed to be nothing good about this place. People thought my critiques were negative, but I didn't really see a reason to be all "pie in the sky" about a place that costs too much and offers too little.

Michael
MORRISSEY

But then the athletic programs started succeeding, and we began to be seen as winners. A polymer research building will soon be built and we finally seem to have a president who has a workable agenda for the UMass system. Maybe things don't seem so bad after all.

I think that life goes in cycles. The good and bad play off one another, and in the natural course of things, your breaks even out. In fact, I like to think that if you live long enough, you'll probably have more good events than bad ones.

I don't know the author's name, but someone wrote a book a few years back called, "Tough Times Don't Last, Tough People Do." It sounds corny, but that's what I believe.

When you decide to take your own life, you throw that natural balance off. Most people who kill themselves do so in the midst of their depression, before things can turn around. Which isn't to downplay some of the serious problems that are out there today.

Killing yourself may solve your problems on Earth, but it usually increases the difficulty of others to go on with their lives. It's a selfish, short-sighted answer, leaving many relatives and friends of suicide victims angry.

Human beings are blessed with abilities that other creatures don't even know about. We have self-awareness; we have the ability to reason; and we can govern ourselves and others in a civilized way.

Our country is the greatest country on Earth. We have capabilities and resources that other countries can only dream about. We can just about choose to do whatever we want to do in the United States.

I'd hate to choose death. I don't ever want to go down without a fight, whether it be cards, at wrestling — or life. There's so much ahead, so ma more things to experience, so many more choices make. I wouldn't want my last choice to be a wr one.

The lessons of first love

"You never forget your first love." There is no way to prove the accuracy of this statement, since I have yet to see college graduation, yet to see mid-life crisis, yet to see old age. Perhaps someday I will forget her, though that is hard to imagine now. She haunts me, she torments me, and she brings me life.

A.J.
STEWART

I was not ready for love, and I certainly wasn't looking for it. I was 18 and ready to go to college. I was ready to leave my old high school friends behind to travel halfway across the country. It was summer and she was beautiful.

Surprisingly, we had gotten through four years of high school together without knowing each other. We had a mutual friend who introduced us at a party. We talked for three hours about magical things and toothbrushes and never before had anything ever felt so right. Her hair was the color of sunsets, and her conversation could make you forget it.

There was a transformation in me that I had never before known. I needed to know that she was all right. I would give all I had to see her laugh. When she smiled, my soul lit up. Her tears always brought my embraces, unconditionally. I never questioned her reasons for being sad. I never told her to cheer up, to get over it, to stop worrying about trivial things. To her, the worries were important, so they became important to me. I can think of no better measure of being in love than that.

She helped me see that there is much more than the individual. She taught me the greatest lesson I have ever learned: you aren't complete until someone loves you, and you love back. Before I knew her I tossed around the word "love" like a 10 dollar football. Now it is the highest word, a holy word. I know what it means, yet realize it can't be defined.

But first loves don't always remain. We went off to school and though we tried to keep things going, separation is more than a distance to be travelled. We grew apart and it wasn't anyone's fault. We didn't feel the way we once did, and it was useless to cling to a memory. It only cheapened what we once had.

Even now I have strong feelings for her. It hurts knowing that she is dating other people, even though I want her to be happy. It is a form of jealousy, only it doesn't derive from pettiness. What I need to do is to separate the lessons I learned from her from my feelings. I owe her a great deal, the least of which is consideration for her happiness. She should be dating if she wants to, and so should I. It doesn't mean that I have forgotten how to love, only that I have yet to find the right person. The only way to get over first loves is realizing you don't have to.

Memories are our one chance for immortality. In the mind and in the heart, great romances can live forever. A tender moment should not be forgotten, nor tarnished, because the person who made it possible is no longer there. Instead it should be more important, more precious because memories are all we leave when we die. Memories are the waters that carry life, the roots that let us grow. They are the past, and the past makes us whole. They will keep my first love safe.

SGA work signals new beginning

I want to congratulate the Student Government Association on their extraordinary campaign to regain litigation rights for the Legal Services Office. They combined an unprecedented education, mobilization and lobbying effort with skillful negotiations to obtain their goal, and kept their "eyes on the prize" even in the face of criticism by those who thought it couldn't, or shouldn't be done. This is, indeed, a new beginning for the Student Government.

Marc Kenen, Director
Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy

Columnist's facts were incorrect

I am writing in response to Corey Snow Puckett [Collegian, Dec. 1]. I'd like to correct some inaccuracies that appeared in Mr. Puckett's piece.

First, I doubt whatever you saw in that store was the M-16, a select fire rifle, capable of firing multiple rounds with each pull of the trigger. Getting a license for a fully automatic weapon is difficult and incredibly expensive.

However, if a collector's criminal background is spotless, they may be approved for a license to purchase automatic weapons. Is this capability of private citizens to own such firearms a danger to society? The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms reports that since 1934, a legally owned automatic weapon has been used to commit a crime only once.

What you probably saw was the AR-15, a semi-automatic version of the M-16. Each time you pull the trigger only one round is fired. According to FBI statistics, semi-automatic "assault" rifles, such as the AR-15, are involved in only one-fifth of one percent of all gun-related crimes. A driver's license wouldn't have helped you buy that AR-15.

In Massachusetts you must have a firearm identification card (FID) to purchase a rifle or shotgun. In fact, you need an FID to legally buy or carry Mace. FID's are obtainable through the police department in the city or town where you reside. Should you have wanted to buy a handgun, Mr. Puckett, you would have needed more than your Mastercard. In Massachusetts you need a pistol permit.

To get one, you must again apply through your local police station, which will conduct a background check. If approved, you must submit current photographs of yourself for police records as well as submit to being fingerprinted.

While the training procedure for obtaining a driver's license may be more comprehensive than the one for obtaining an FID, nowhere in the Bill of Rights are you guaranteed the right to drive a car. You are, however, guaranteed the right to bear arms. The Second Amendment gives you the right to own a gun, just as the First Amendment gives you the right to write essays without doing research.

I agree that this world would be a nicer place to live if people lived together in peace and harmony. Unfortunately, that isn't reality. Reality is a lot less friendly.

Christianity relies on revelation rather than preference

On the back of the United States one dollar bill is an eagle holding in its mouth an unrolled scroll with the inscription "E Pluribus Unum." This Latin phrase, meaning "from the many, one," has been grossly misused in our society.

This national sense of unity is at the core of the principle of religious toleration. The founding fathers' desired that no "established national religion" exist. Consequently, there was to be no one religion that could claim exclusive privilege under the law.

From this principle has come the idea that no one religion could claim exclusivity to the truth. Thus a religious claim to the truth usually stirs anger from those who object. The following statement often results: "What you believe may be true to you, but not to me."

This is a relativistic statement that has deeply penetrated the majority of peoples' minds. Consequences have been the developments of pluralism and relativism.

The concept of plurality is valid. For example, many ethnic groups exist. The concept of relativity is equally as valid. For example, motion can be viewed from different reference points. The problem occurs when the suffix "ism" is added.

Diana
D'AVANZO

Pluralism consists of diversity but no ultimate unity. Thus, there is no unity to life. Relativism states that there are different perspectives from which to consider everything; therefore, nothing is concrete or ultimately true.

A key phrase associated with relativism is "there are no absolutes." This emphatically implies there is no standard or ultimate reference point by which we can judge. Thus, we have values but no value, truths but not truth, and purposes but no purpose. The only reference point we have is ourselves. The result is "What's true to you is true to you, what's true to me is true to me."

If this is the case, we live by preferences.

Relativism assumes one of two premises: 1) God does not exist or 2) A barrier exists between God and man which prevents our knowing him and having a relationship with him. These assumptions have been proven false by both logic and history.

Logic demands the existence of a self-existent being. The law of causality points to a being who needs no cause to exist. The only way we could know this self-existent being is through revelation.

Historically, the christian Bible has recorded a full revelation of God in the person of Jesus Christ. This opposes relativism in the the christian truth claims are based on objective evidence rather than personal preferences.

If Christians believed Christ was the only way to God because it is their way, it would be a shared act of arrogance. Christians, however, believe Christ's claims because of what he said and who he proved himself to be.

It is recorded that Jesus healed the sick, cured blind eyes and raised the dead. He even foretold his own death and resurrection. God is truly active and exciting!

Today there is much opposition to Christianity. This opposition exists because Christianity relies on revelation rather than preference. The problem, then, is that people have trouble accepting the absolute that the Bible reveals. This absolute clearly contradicts relativism.

So, why do christians insist on proclaiming the truth of Jesus Christ? The answer is simple. Instead of pampering others for the sake of preferences, Christians insist on people not only knowing the truth, "Jesus answered, 'I am the way and the truth and the life'"(Jn 14:6), but also knowing that the truth is not relative. There is a definite choice of either acceptance or rejection of the truth, and the consequences of both actions, that must be made.

Writers discuss Third World influence

By SONIA PAZ
Collegian Correspondent

On December 2nd The Creative Writing Committee at Amherst College sponsored a dialogue with writers Anita Desai, Caryl Phillips, and Ilan Stavans entitled "The Other Voice, Third World Writers in English".

As the writers told of their experiences of being born in "Third World Countries" and finally writing in the United States, they raised many questions dealing with multiculturalism and the role of literature from other countries.

Prior to World War II, literature was mainly controlled by European and American writers. It was common for authors such as Hemmingway to influence writers from Latin America, but not the other way around. After WWII, the emergence of writers from Latin America, The Carribean, and India gave the literary world a new perspective.

Along with this also came labeling. Around this time, phrases such as "Third World" came about, creating a hierarchy amoung the nations.

"When you use phrases such as 'First World' and 'Third World', you describe yourself as another" said Phillips, "You end up tip-toeing down the road of totalitarianism that is in now existance in Europe."

Phillips, Stavans, and Desai, through their writings not only experimented with writing styles, ideas, and languages, also discovered who they were. "Sometimes I feel as if I am two people", Stavas said. He reffered to his experience of being a Mexican Writer in America. Feeling as if sometimes he lost touch with his spanish speaking readers, he stated "No matter how much I want to put the two worlds together, it is impossible.

Phillips at one point told his listeners of his experience of being born in the West Indies and raised in England. While growing up, along with hearing racial slurs and hearing his school mates constantly tell him to go back to where he came from, Phillips came to a conclusion not about nationality, but about race. "The only race I have loyalty to is the Human Race".

Desai on the other hand, coming from a home where Hindi, German and English were spoken, felt that this was her inspiration in writing about India through the eyes of charcters who they themselves were not Indian. Thus she believes that art through literature is a way for people of all cultures to communicate.

With this in mind, Desai, Phillips, and Stavans not only explored other cultures, political ideals, but also journeyed into self determination.

Czar bones cause stir

By ANNE THOMPSON
Associated Press

BOSTON — As Russia prepares to give Nicholas II and his family a proper burial, a U.S. public broadcasting station and two filmmakers are fighting over legal rights to rare footage of the last czar's bones.

WGBH-TV wants the footage for NOVA, its popular weekly science program.

Claiming a financial disagreement, the filmmakers refuse to hand over the tape, which shows a renowned forensic anthropologist examining skeletal remains.

Victoria Lewis and Frank Simeone, a husband-and-wife San Francisco production team, say the station owes them $200,000. WGBH says it contracted to pay them $65,000, and asked a federal judge to order the filmmakers to turn over the tape.

The judge on Wednesday denied the motion and gave attorneys until Dec. 10 to settle out of court. But both sides agree that if the remains are buried at the end of the month as scheduled, the hours of film will become even more valuable as a historic resource.

"It is the only footage that exists of the bones being examined by a genuine certified forensic expert," said the filmmakers' attorney Lee Bromberg.

On the tape, Dr. Williams Maples examines nine sets of skeletal remains at a laboratory in Yekaterinberg, Russia. In that city, the last czar, his children and some servants were executed in July 1918 on the orders of the country's new Bolshevik leaders.

The question of what happened to their bodies was a longstanding mystery and, in the Soviet Union, a taboo subject. U.S. officials maintain that Russian scientists excavated the burial site in 1982, but kept the discovery secret for 10 years.

Lewis said she started researching the project in 1991, after her Russian teacher showed her a videotape that had been smuggled into the U.S. from the then-Soviet Union.

The tape, filmed in 1979 by a Russian monk, depicted the man who discovered the czars remains, she said.

"There were the skulls of Nicholas and Alexandra on his kitchen table," she said.

Moved by the man's request that the czar and his family be given a proper burial, Lewis said she decided to make her own film.

"It was very eerie. Just like all the mystery that's surrounded the czar's death. That moment was very mystical for me," Lewis said.

Scientists make gains on cancer

By DANIEL Q. HANEY
Associated Press

BOSTON — Scientists have tracked down a flawed gene that causes about one in six cases of colon cancer, one of the most common inherited disorders, and say it should quickly lead to the first broadly used genetic screening test.

Unlike many basic scientific discoveries, experts believe this one will have almost immediate practical uses.

They predict that within a few months or two years at the most, there will be a simple blood test to spot people with the defective gene so they can be carefully watched for signs of cancer. Colon cancer can be easily stopped if found soon enough, so early detection is a highly effective was to save lives.

Dr. Bert Vogelstein of Johns Hopkins University, one of the discoverers, said the test should probably be taken by anyone with a parent, grandparent or other close relative who has ever suffered colon or uteris cancer.

"That's millions and millions of people," he said.

Dr. Francis Collins, director of the National Center for Human Genome Research, predicted the test will eventually be offered to anyone worried about cancer, even those with no family history of the disease.

Northampton clerk dismissed

Mass. Supreme Court cites preferential treatment

BOSTON (AP)- A court clerk who built a reputation for misbehavior by acting rude to fellow workers and disposing of traffic tickets for friends was fired Thursday by the state Supreme Judicial Court.

Janet Rowe Dugan, a clerk-magistrate in Northampton District Court, carried out a "systematic, long-continuing, and uneven administration of the law," the high court said in a unanimous opinion.

The court said "the public good requires her removal."

Dugan, who had been appointed to her job in 1982, was suspended by the court earlier this year after complaints about her actions. Following a series of hearings, the court's Commitee on Professional Responsibility for Clerks of the Courts recommended that she be removed.

During one of those hearings, court workers described how Dugan would scream at them and tell them they were fired. One clerk said Dugan told her to "go commit suicide" after an argument.

But Dugan's suporters have said while the clerk might have an abrasive personality, she also has shown a strong commitment to the work of the courts.

But in its ruling, the high court said Dugan's problems extended beyond her personality. The court said Dugan used her office to show favoritism to selected people, to punish people with whom she had disagreements, to deny the press access to public records and to enlist court workers to run personal errands for her.

"The grounds for the removal of the clerk from office arise not from a single incident or even from a handfulk of incidents.," the court said. "They derive from a large number of events."

Neither Dugan nor her attorney immediately returned repeated phone calls Thursday seeking comment.

But Judge Alvertus Morse of the Northampton District Court was not surprised by the decision.

"There were many of us.... who advised her all along that she was going to get into trouble," the judge said. "But she felt she was a power unto herself."

Kings, prostitutes, shipwrecks take center stage in Pericles

COURTESY THERESA A.B. GAUTHIER

"Pericles," says Michael Tritto, "is like a great 'B' movie."

Peopled with evil kings, princesses, prostitutes, shipwrecks and incest, the rarely performed adventure was one of William Shakespeare's biggest commercial successes. It is also this semester's offering at the Rand Theatre, where if opened last night under Tritto's direction.

The eponymous hero of Pericles is the young Prince of Tyre (Michael Lombardi), whose romantic adventures result in the birth of a daughter, Marina (Megan McEnulty) — who is offered for adoption when Pericles is presumed lost in a shipwreck. Shakespeare divides the evening between events that preceded the birth of Marina and the search of father and daughter to rediscover one another. "Beneath its adventure plot," Tritto explains, "this play plumbs the profound relationship between fathers and daughters and the painful process of growing into a man."

But above these issues, Pericles is entertainment — and that is what made it such a considerable success in its time. The swashbuckling hero romances women and wages battles which bring him through six diverse lands, and from youth to maturity. The play is light entertainment, with romance and melodrama, and is difficult to classify in such trusted Shax groupings as Comedy and Tragedy. "Shakespeare is appealing," Tritto says, "to an audience of diverse tastes and backgrounds."

Pericles is also exceptional among the body of the Bard's work, for the unusual prescence of a narrator (played here by Betsy Rabkin). This oddity, combined with questionable quartos of the play, have led historians to speculate that only portions of the existing text were written by Shakespeare.

"It's a curiosity," acknowledges Tritto, who is treating the play as an entertaining, audacious myth.

Among the collaborators on the Rand Theatre production are Cloud Nine composer Peter Fernandez, who has written an original musical score for the show, and costumer Rose Brown, whose work will represent the six "diverse cultures" presented in the play.

"It is," Tritto notes, "all very entertaining in the end."

Pericles; Prince of Tyre will be performed Dec. 3-4, and 8-11 at 8 p.m. in the Rand Theatre. Tickets are available from the Fine Arts Center Box Office, 545-2511, or at the door.

Boston shops' musical finds, Aussies weak

In your best interest, here's a brief look at why if you've never been to Boston (fear, procrastination, city-hatred), it's time. While the Valley's record stores are adequate sources of a decent amount of harder to find music, the wealth of musical goldmines in Boston is monumental.

Start your journey in Kenmore Square and, provided it's in good condition, bring anything you want to sell. Nuggets and Planet Records are at the pinnacle of used album purveyance. While their buying prices are at best nominal, you just can't find the new Afghan Whigs anywhere else for $6.

SOUNDS FROM THE VALLEY
Compiled by Brian Babineau & Adam Goulston

If you have a virgin album complex, take a stroll down to Newbury Street's Newbury Comics and Tower Records. Despite the deceptively small size, Newbury Comics is superior. The tiny storefront houses an immense selection if you can get through the door. By the way, before you plonk down $14.99 for your selection, find a copy of the free "City Shopper," they almost always have coupons for both stores.

But, if you seek a rare import along the lines of Stereolab's Low-Fi or The Wedding Present's Tommy, get back on the T and Red Line it to Harvard Square. The Cambridge branch of Tower Records has the best selection of imports and underground rarities around. If you walk out of Tower empty-handed, try HMV around the corner or Newbury Comics in The Garage. No virgin complex? In Your Ear and Mystery Train are also walking distance.

To summarize...virgin complex? Boston. No virgin complex? Boston. Big fan of modern R&B? Dude, try the mall...

Benefit albums, benefit albums...If you've got a cause, we've got an album. How about "Drink Together: Artists Banded Against Keg Laws?" Or "Reek Together: Musicians To Help College Students Afford Laundry?" I'm sure we could get Michael Stipe and Natalie Merchant to do a lovely duet...

University Dancers taking Bowker by storm

By KRISTEN ROUNTREE

University Dancers
Bowker Auditorium
Dec. 2, 1993

With all the events taking place at the end of the semester, certain, lesser-known performances may get lost in the shuffle and go unnoticed. "Dancing Up a Storm," presented by the University Dancers last night in Bowker Auditorium, may have been one of the numerous productions running at this busy time of year, but for those who did see it, it was well worth the hour and a half spent.

The show opened with "Homecoming," a piece choreographed by the troupe of 11 dancers which reflected the style of each individual performing in it. This piece was unique in allowing each dancer to perform his or her own movements individually, rather than the same movements in synchrony.

Some of the pieces, such as "Feathering," "Glastonbury," and "Fissure," were choreographed in the now-popular modern dance style. One may equate modern dance with abstract music and simple, unstylized movements, but the dancers' added ballet and jazz-like movements gave them style and broke up the monotony.

Also worth seeing were the comic "Telephone Tag," which used telephones as props and featured the dancers running around the stage more than actually dancing, and the sole ballet piece, "Corsage," adding an element of grace and gentleness seen less often in today's performances.

Ending the show was the upbeat, jazz-like piece, "Forest," featuring nine dancers and the music of Deep Forest. This number presented us with a return to the synchronized, stylized movements common to this genre of dance.

"Dancing Up a Storm" was a fine performance in allowing its audience to develop a wider appreciation for all styles of dance. If you are looking for something to do this weekend and want to expose yourself to a variety of dance forms, come check out the University Dancers tonight and tomorrow night at 8 p.m.

Dancing at Lughnasa illustrates a celtic utopia

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

For its natives and residents, Ballybeg, County Donegal, Ireland, is a small rural whisp of wheatfields and farmers. For millions of theatregoers across the world it is also the heart of Brian Friel territory, the Celtic utopia which rests at the heart of the dramatist's work. In Dancing at Lughnasa, opening this weekend at Smith College, Ballybeg becomes the setting for a rueful play of memories recalling the dissolution of a close family in the 1930's.

The Mundys are an unusual clan: five sisters, adult and unwed, sharing the custody of a young boy. Sheltered in the hills, they live a meagre and remote life, but one that resounds with the sounds of laughter and of music from their beloved Marconi radio. We are transported to this life by that lone, male child, Michael Mundy — now an adult looking back on the events which shaped that final Ballybeg Summer.

The first was the arrival of Uncle Jack, an army missionary who returned from Africa on the edge of death, to live out his remaining days in the shadow of the pagan festival to Lugh. The second, was the arrival of Michael's father: a shiftless Welshman who dances and romances the sisters with smiles and charms while blindly pulling them apart.

Winner of the 1991 Tony Award for Best Play, Lughnasa experienced difficulty in its Broadway run when the entire cast of Irish actors (from the Abbey Theatre) was deported by Actors Equity Association, bringing about an anti-climactic end to what had become Friel's most celebrated work. This year, Lughnasa has come back to life, becoming the single most produced play in America, with new stagings in theatres across the country.

The latest of these productions will open tonight at Smith College's Theatre 14, where director Ellen Kaplan will stage the play as a story about "the disintegration of one world, and its replacement with another, perhaps harsher, way of life."

This outlook promises to capture the unsentimental brilliance of the play, which saddens and thrills in its uncompromising depiction of simple realities. Friel's play is one which manages both to swell with mythic implications of religion and culture, and to entrance with its memory. It is a dance worth joining.

Dancing at Lughnasa will be performed Dec. 3-4 and 8-11 at 8 p.m. and Dec. 5 at 2 p.m. in Smith College's Theatre 14. Phone 585-3220 for further details.

aren't the hitmakers they once were. They have a new album, Full Moon, Dirty Hearts, but aren't really big news anymore. Why? Here's a theory. They aren't very good. They got lucky with Kick, had a few hits, but they've got no real talent, and thankfully, most consumers have gotten tired of their bland, poseur-studboy-dance-rock. Those silly Aussies would do well to find a "new sensation."

Industrial music hit a peak in 1991, with Nine Inch Nails and Ministry starring in concurrent Lollapalooza tours. Since then, the industrial scene has cooled off considerably, and is in need of new spark. That spark could be the Nine Inchers long awaited new album, if Trent could ever fight off record company woes and release the stupid thing. The music industry certainly could use a medicinal dose of Mr. Reznor's anger spilling all over the charts...

Speaking of disappearing bands, did The Stone Roses ever exist, or was that just a strange dream?...The more I see U2's Bono dress in silly outfits and paint on makeup, the more I realize he looks strangely similar to what David Bowie and Peter Gabriel looked like years ago...

The '80s revival is in full swing 'round these parts, and if Nirvana would just put out an album of OMD and Human League covers, along with some synth-pop originals, it would be complete. Barring that, however, we are the ones who need to get it rolling, so plug in those Atari 2600s, put on some Blondie and push our decade out of the '70s and forward...

Upcoming Stuff:

Pearl Street: Stuff worth checking out, tonight it's Boston's The Fools (yes they still exist) and next Thursday, God Street Wine (sweet listening). But the best of the best comes Tuesday with a local extravaganza topped by the Velvet Voodoo Dolls and rising talent Cameron's Way.

Iron Horse: Noted folk singer/guitarist Fred Small takes the stage tonight, the jazz of the Buster Williams Quintet tomorrow night and the country/bluegrass tinged The Cox Family on Sunday.

Hatch: Killer jams tonight with Synasthesia and Cottonmouth. Great tunes, great bunch of guys.

Campus Center Concourse: Last day to catch those guys with the drums.

Karate tries comeback

By MARTIN FINUCANE
Associated Press

BOSTON — A bill that would authorize professional karate bouts in Massachusetts is back on its feet in the state Senate, despite several knockdowns in recent years.

This bill, "An Act to Establish a State Karate Committee," was reported out of the Senate Ways and Means Committee Thursday and was headed to the Senate floor.

Sen. James Jajuga, D-Methuen, said the idea was to "elevate" the little-known sport.

"Right now, if there's a professional fight in this area, it has to be done in New Hampshire or Rhode Island and that's a problem. There's no good reason why we shouldn't regulate it, make sure there's appropriate protections and just move forward with it," he said.

The bill would establish the commission and regulate the sport. It would cost about $40,000 a year. But it calls for the state to receive 6 percent of the receipts from bouts and 4 percent from broadcasting revenue.

"There's no exposure and that's the problem with the sport... If we get this thing going, we're going to get a lot of kids involved and they're going to be off the street because they're going to be busy training," said Richard Kimber, the Federation International of Kick Boxing world cruiserweight champion and an Essex County sheriff's deputy.

Bratton leaves Boston for New York City post

By JANET KERLIN
Associated Press

BOSTON - One way or another, Boston will start the New Year with a new police commissioner.

Commisioner William Bratton takes office on New York in Jan. 2. Paul Evans, who he appointed as his second-in-command in Boston, will become the city's interim commissioner in case Mayor Thomas Menino does not appoint a replacement by 1994.

Evans described Bratton "among the most well-respected police administrators in the country," and said he planned to continue Bratton's momentum of community policing, which means increased foot patrols and neighborhood problem solving.

"Reducing fear in the neighborhoods will be the No. 1 focus," Evans said, citing the need for the money to hire 300 officers expected under President Clinton's crime bill.

Mayor Thomas Menino said he was appointing former U.S. attorney Wayne Budd to head a search committee for a commissioner.

Supporters said Bratton accomplished a lot in fiuve months on the job. Detractors described him as an ambitious player who was gunning for New York City's top cop position almost as soon as he arrived.

He got the job after a 10-day courtship with New York Mayor-elect Rudolph Giuliani.

"I'm happy for Commissioner Bratton that he go the job he always wanted," Menino said from Orlando, Fla., where he was attending a Natiional League of Cities Conference. "The department won't miss a beat. We'll just keep on going."

Bratton was credited with improving community policing, efficiency, and plans for a better 911 emergency response system.

But not everyone thought Bratton had done a good job heading up the 2,000-member force here.

images of "passing" men and women were shown, with quite a few "before and after" pictures. Before, they were discovered as transgender and after, they were forced to act in a manner appropriate to their gender.

Feinberg presented among the slides a group on berdache, transgendered men and women from native socleties. Some of the most haunting photos were of Native Americans who had been accepted by the people of their own cultures, and whom had been ostracized by the neo-american culture.

After the presentation, Feinberg talked with several members of the audience, signing copies of both her pamphlet Transgender Liberation: A movement whose time has come, and her now famous novel, Stone Butch Blues. The novel has been optioned for a movie by Against The Tide Productions, and will open on the Hollywood screen. Feinberg is currently writing a second novel, Drag King Dreams, about the experiences of her/himself and other transgendered persons.

"I just had absolutely no idea that there were all these women passing as men," said Lilly Knight, a biology major.

Junior psychology major, Joanna Farewell commented, "I think it was a very knowledgable and wise presentation. She has a grand personality. . .I stayed up every night to read her book, it was a ritual; 11pm to 2am every night for a week and a half. . .I read and savored every word, it was incredible."

Feinberg will have a book signing at Pride and Joy Bookstore in Northampton today, from 2-4pm. S/he will also be reading and discussing at FPH West at Hampshire College this evening in a lecture, CROSSING THE BORDERS: CONTEXTUALIZING TRANSGENDER LIBERATION WITH(IN/OUT) FEMINIST AND QUEER POLITICS."

Doug Moseley and David Lymen, both business students at UMass, are doing a co-op at the State Street Bank. They are both being payed $10 an hour and have received permanent job offers after graduating.

"The companies are calling us, begging for students for the spring semester. The Boston Globe has 50 something positions, paying $350 a week. Only three UMass students have applied," Silver said.

Students can still apply for spring co-ops. Businesses will accept applications up until the add/drop period. "Students should not be intimidated by these opportunities. They are incredible and can help the students future in the job market after graduation," Silver said.

ARAM COMEAU / COLLEGIAN

The Minutemen will need strong play from the likes of sophomores Donta Bright and Dana Dingle (pictured here against Towson State) if they are to be successful in the absence of freshman center Marcus Camby.

3 Keys for UMass/St. Bonaventure

Lou Roe vs. Harry Moore

Roe (23.6 ppg, 9.2 rpg) has exploded into the national spotlight with his play early this season, while the 6-foot-8 Moore (16.0 ppg, 7.5 rpg) has NBA scouts looking at his skills on the court. Roe and Moore are the best players on their respective teams so look for them to try to set the pace early.

The battle of the boards

The Minutemen have been big on the offensive glass this season, grabbing 101 rebounds at the offensive end. Those rebounds have led to a 31 shot advantage over their opponents. Moore, Jeff Quackenbush and co. will have to keep Roe, Dana Dingle (10.0 ppg, 7.0 rpg) and Donta Bright (13.8 ppg, 7.4 rpg) off the glass if the Bonnies hope to keep it close.

St. Bonaventure vs. UMass defense

The UMass pressure defense has forced its opponents into nearly 20 turnoves a game, so St. Bonaventure, which is averaging 17.5 turnovers a game, is going to have to protect the ball against the Minuteman D. Guards David Vanterpool (18.5 ppg), Nii Nelson-Richards (13.5 ppg) and pint-sized freshman Shandue McNeil (4.5 apg, 3.0 spg) will need to exhibit much poise and control.

only the club's fifth of the young season. Will the real Derrick Coleman please show up at the Meadowlands anytime soon and take the No. 44 back from the sellout who is shooting 41 percent from the field? There are guys who put up better numbers from downtown.

The gap between teams like the Nets and Starks' Knicks is huge; actually, Pat Riley and that overrated center who wants to be a forward are enjoying life atop the Eastern Conference.

With No. 23 out of the picture, the Knickerbockers appeared to be the front-runners to succeed the Bulls. That is until the season began and the Western teams decided they wanted to challenge for the title for the first time in a while. Of course, the hottest team in the league is Rudy's Rockets, compiling a 14-0 record heading into last night's contest with the Knicks. By the time you read this, the perfect record could be history.

But that will not take away from Hakeem Olajuwon's quest to be the best — he has made it. And why has Houston been so successful, Coach T?

"We don't do it with tricks. We do it with hard work, defense, guts, sweat, teamwork and pulling together," said Tomjanovich, who was doing his best impersonation of Massachusetts Coach John Calipari.

This is the first and last edition of Notes for me this semester, so I'll make some predictions. Yeah, I could pick Seattle, Houston, Phoenix or the Knicks to win it all; however, I'm trying to shake my image of Master of the Obvious. How about Utah?

Every year the Jazz rides a mythodical offense into the playoffs and runs into a better, more physical and well-coached team that knocks them out. This season could be the final hurrah for John Stockton and Karl Malone together. Maybe they can pull it off.

Nah, I'll go against the grain and pick the Admiral, the Worm and the Former Drug Addict. I think John Lucas' Spurs are top-heavy, with Robinson, Rodman, Willie Anderson and Dale Ellis all playing over 40 minutes a game. But if they can get some depth on the bench, which will be tough, San Antonio may scare some people.

Did you see that?

• How about Lord Charles? Now he's ready to retire after the season. Pretty soon they're going to have to run a Stay in the League Jam during All-Star Weekend. First MJ, now Barkley. The NBA and social security — perfect together.

• Shaq's rap album. Let it be said that it is no Pearl Jam Vs.

• About six ping-pong balls coming to Beantown with Celtic logos on them. Enough said.

No. 9 Minutemen now in unchartered territory

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

When Massachusetts (4-1) travels to Olean, N.Y., tomorrow night to open up its 1993-94 Atlantic 10 campaign against St. Bonaventure (1-1), the Minutemen will be playing their first contest in a new land.

No, not New York, but Top 10 country.

UMass entered the Top 10 rankings for the first time in school history, coming in at No. 9, last Monday after advancing to the finals of the Pre-Season NIT and defeating Big Eight power Oklahoma on the road.

For such a young team, the high ranking means different things to different players and coaches. Being No. 9 is important for different reasons, but not so important for other reasons. For Minuteman Coach John Calipari, the high ranking is not terribly important, yet.

"Rankings don't mean much now," Calipari said. "But if we're in the Top 10 in March then it will mean something."

UMass assistant James "Bruiser" Flint said that being No. 9 can both help or hurt you.

"I think the ranking can be a double-edged sword," said Flint. "You can walk into some gyms and people can fear you because you're No. 9 in the country. Or you can walk into the gym and guys are going to be so hyped that they're going to play the best games of their lives. And then they go out and beat you.

"I'm happy that we're No. 9, but we're only five games into the season," said Flint. "We have got to keep working hard so that we stay up there."

As for the players, the high ranking is important to them, but it not does not necessarily mean everything.

"It feels good, but we just can't get bigheaded about the situation just because we're ranked number nine in the country," said sophomore forward Donta Bright. "We have to keep having good practices and execute our plays and play defense in the games."

Junior co-captain Derek Kellogg views the top ranking as a big confidence boost.

"It's good to be there (in the Top 10), especially this early in the season," said Kellogg. "It gives us confidence that we can play with the top teams in the country and it gives us a gauge of where we our compared to other teams."

Compared to St. Bonaventure, the Minutemen are at a totally different level. The Bonnies have been the perennial A-10 cellar dweller, while UMass has gravitated towards the top of the conference.

However, second year coach Jim Baron has experience galore (five starters) returning in Bonnie land. Among those returnees include forward Harry Moore, a member of the First Team All A-10 last season.

The other experienced returnees include guards Nii Nelson-Richards and David Vanterpool, forward Garland Mance and center Jeff Quackenbush.

The Bonnies opened up the season by squeaking by Canisius 84-83, but then fell to Navy on Wednesday 73-70.

Hockey heads to Maine for weekend contests

By MATT VAUTOUR
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts hockey team heads north to Maine this weekend for match-ups against Colby College and Bowdoin.

The road has been unfriendly to the Minutemen so far this season as they have a 1-2 record away from the Mullins Center, and this weekend poses no easy task.

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts hockey team hopes to improve on its 1-2 road record when it travels to Maine this weekend for contests with Colby and Bowdoin.

"When our schedule was finalized in August, I thought a real true test for us was going to be going up to play Bowdoin and Colby," said Massachusetts Coach Joe Mallen. "They're both very good teams, with good skills."

The Polar Bears of Bowdoin have looked impressive early, winning their first four games of the season. Coach Terry Meagher's team has a lot of experience and a very potent offense.

"On paper, our forward lines are our obvious strength," said Meagher.

The forward line of Marcello Gentile, and twins Charlie and Joe Gaffney have played strong thus far. Charlie is on his way to breaking his own school record (set last season) for points in a season with 15 in only two games.

David Kilduff will likely get the assignment of facing the shots of Bowdoin's potent offense, but if the Minuteman defense which has given up less 200 shots all season can shut down Bowdoin's first line Kilduff could have a quiet evening. Rick Moriarty will likely be the starter against the White Mules of Colby.

"Next to Merrimack and St. Lawrence, Bowdoin is better than any of the teams we've played so far," said Mallen. "They'll play a very skilled style. They'll be very well coached and have players whose individual talents are better than a lot of the teams that we've played."

The Colby White Mules will try to overcome their youth and inexperience in hopes of upsetting UMass.

"We're a very young team, playing with 10 freshmen," said Colby Coach Scott Borek. "We'll try to play a controlled style, but with our inexperience, we sometimes get forced to play a dump and chase style."

"Our smaller rink will help us slow them down," said Borek. "UMass will be a stretch for us talentwise. We're going to approach it like an exhibition game and use it as an opportunity to test ourselves."

"Our objective obviously is to go up there, play six good periods and win both games," Mallen said.

Kenny A, Rudy and the Rockets

Art Stapleton's Notes from the Hardwood

"People gave him a bad rap as a dirty player, but I look at him as a player who intimidated and was successful at it" — John Starks.

Since I'm in a New York state of mind after spending a majority of last weekend in Madison Square Garden, the Big Apple, I decided to put the NFL to bed — permanently. I've traded the pigskin for the roundball once again, so you get two installments of the Hardwood before the end of the semester (this one and next week's by my faithful compadre and fellow Lionel Richie fan club member, Andrew James Bryce).

Referring to the quote in my opening, Starks was talking about Bill Laimbeer and his recent retirement from the National Basketball Association. Personally, I think Mr. Cheap Shot was sounding off in the third person. Guess what, Johnny? Kenny's back, and all of the Nets' fanatics remember last season when you took Anderson down, sidelining him for the year with a fractured wrist.

Well, the point-man extraordinaire put up 29 points and dished out a career-high 18 assists Wednesday night in New Jersey's 97-82 drubbing of Cleveland. However, the Jersey win was

Minutewomen garner awards

Salisbury, Jelley and Hockenbrock are All-Americans

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

It's that time of the year again for the University of Massachusetts field hockey team.

Right around this time each year word comes in to the folks in Boyden that certain members of the team and a certain coach have received post-season honors.

This season would be no different for Massachusetts as three Minutewomen have earned All-American honors and Coach Pam Hixon was named Northeast Region Coach of the Year for the second straight year.

These awards follow a season that saw the Minutewomen go 19-4 and finish the season ranked No. 5. Massachusetts lost 2-1 in the quarterfinals of the NCAA Tournament to eventual champion Maryland.

Leading the way for the Minutewoman march to the podium was senior forward Jenn Salisbury. Salisbury, who was a third-team All-American selection last season, was named to the first team this year. Salisbury was also named Northeast Region All-America first team, first team All-Atlantic 10 and the A-10's Offensive Player of the Year (an award she shared last season with teammate Ainslee Press) for her 39 point (eight goals, 23 assists) performance this year, which placed her second on the Massachusetts team, behind junior sweeper Natalie Hart.

Senior forward and co-captain Tara Jelley was named to the All-America second team after racking up 30 points on 12 goals and six assists this season. Those totals were good for fourth on the Minutewoman squad. Jelley was also named All A-10 first team and Northeast Region first team All-American.

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

Senior midfielder Holly Hockenbrock was one of three players from the University of Massachusetts field hockey team to be named to the All-America team this past week.

Rounding out the All-American honors for Massachusetts is senior midfielder, third leading scorer and co-captain Holly Hockenbrock. Hockenbrock led the Minutewomen in assists with 24 and also scored four goals for a 32-point season. Hockenbrock was named third team All-American, first team All A-10 and first team Northeast Region All-American.

Hixon, who is featured in the "Faces In The Crowd" section of this week's Sports Illustrated, has now had 36 players selected to the All-America team since becoming head coach in 1978.

Palestinian gunman kills Israeli soldier

By DAN PERRY
Associated Press

HOLON, Israel — A Palestinian boarded a bus and opened fire with an assault rifle Sunday, killing a reservist before being gunned down by troops. It was the first major attack inside Israel since it signed a peace pact with the PLO.

Senior ministers warned Israelis to brace for a possible frenzy of attacks by opponents of the accord as the Dec. 13 deadline approaches for Israel to start transferring power to the PLO in parts of the occupied territories.

In Egypt, Israel and the PLO resumed talks on Palistinian autonomy. They had been stalled over conditions for Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and the West Bank town of Jericho.

U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher toured the Middle East to push forward the peace process and was to meet Monday in Amman with PLO chairman Yasser Arafat and Jordanian officials.

A radical Palistinian group opposed to the accord, Islamic Jihad, took responsibility for Sunday's attack in a leaflet issued in the Gaza Strip.

The gunman tried to hijack the bus when it stopped at an intersection in this Tel Aviv suburb but was killed by Israeli soldiers, police said. A 32-year-old reserve soldier was fatally wounded by the gunman, Israel's national news agency Itim reported.

The reservist apparently was sitting behind the driver, and radio reports said another soldier was lightly wounded. Investigators at the scene said the attacker's gun, an Israel army assault rifle, apparently jammed.

It was the most menacing attack inside Israel since it signed the accord with the Palestine Liberation Organization on Sept. 13 and one likely to engender hostility in a public already skeptical about the peace process.

"In the interim period, the opponents to peace on both sides are flexing their muscles and won't stop at anything, they will use any means, to frustrate the process," Health Minister Haim Ramon said Sunday.

The latest Palistinian victim was a 45-year-old vegetable vendor who died from his wounds Sunday after being shot by Jewish settlers Saturday as he was riding in a taxi in the occupied West Bank.

Witnesses said a settler fired from a road barricade as the taxi was backing up to avoid a confrontation. The settlers claimed the car was trying to run them over.

In Sunday's attack, police said the Palestinian gunman jumped from a stolen car as the bus idled at a bus stop and began firing into the bus, which carried about two dozen passengers.

An army sergeant riding near the rear said he loaded his M-16 rifle and ran forward to see the bus driver shoving a Palestinian out the door.

Porter faces sentencing today

Former priest could face two hundred years in prison

NEW BEDFORD, Mass. (AP)—A former Roman Catholic priest who admitted to molesting 28 children in three Massachusetts parishes in the 1960s faces a possible prison term Monday, when he is scheduled to be sentenced in New Bedford Superior Court.

James R. Porter pleaded guilty Oct. 5 to 41 counts, including 27 charges of indecent assault and battery of a child under 14. The maximum sentence would be as much as 200 years imprisonment, but the actual sentence was expected to be less.

Sources close to the case said the Bristol County District Attorney's Office was expected to recommend that Porter serve two consecutive 18 to 20 year sentences, but Richard Fabio, spokesman for the district attorney's office, would not confirm that recommendation.

While he technically would be eligible for parole after 12 years, the Parole Board rarely grants early release to sex offenders.

Porter's lawer, Peter DeGelleke, of Concord, is recommending that Porter, 58, be sentenced to 29 months of inpatient treatment in Minnesota, where he now lives with his wife and four children.

"Clearly, the overall interests of society would be best protected, not by jailing Mr. Porter, but by requiring him to complete this rigorous program and by subjecting him to close supervision, as he is currently receiving, for an indefinite period of time after his release," DeGelleke wrote in his sentencing recommendation, which is to be presented in court Monday.

Porter was convicted last year in Minnesota of molesting his children's babysitter. He recieved a six-month jail term.

At the time Porter pleaded guilty, prosecuters said as many as 125 men and women had come forward, willing to testify that Porter had molested them.

Several said they had complained to church leaders at the time, but to no avail.

DeGelleke said while it does not diminish Porter's personal guilt, the Diocese of Fall River repeatedly assigned Porter to parish work even after they knew of his tendency toward child sexual abuse.

One positive outcome of this case has been the reform of church policies for dealing with sexually abusive clergy," he said.

In addition to the recommendations of the prosecu-

New legislation could end foul play vs. gays in schools

By JONATHAN YENKIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Christopher Muther looks back at his school days as a time of torture, when he always felt uncomfortable because he was gay.

He was taunted by classmates, who called him "queer" and "faggot." Fellow members of the track team beat him up. Once, someone knocked his tooth loose by punching him in the mouth, but feeling embarrassed he told people it happened while playing football.

"I sort of felt subhuman," he says. "You just felt worthless."

But other gay teens may soon find it easier to make their way through the school in Massachusetts. Lawmakers here are on the verge of enacting what activists say would be the nation's first statewide ban on discrimination against gay students in public schools.

Proponents say the legislation will give gay students a weapon to combat the harassment that leads some teen-agers to drop out or even commit suicide.

"The atmosphere of verbal abuse denies gay students their rights to an education," said David LaFontaine, political director for the state Coalition of Gay and Lesbian Civil Rights.

A 1989 report from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services found that homosexuals accounted for 30 percent of all youth suicides. It also estimated 28 percent of gay students drop out of school.

But beyond those statistics, legislators have heard compelling, firsthand accounts from current and former students who described the abuse they suffered.

Among them was Steven Obuchowski, now a student at Brandeis University, who said high school classmates would knock him down, drag him on the ground and slam his hands in lockers. In gym class, students would shove food and

American Muslims said to endure misperception

By BARBARA CANNISTRARO
Collegian Correspondent

During the Persian Gulf War, Professor Azizah al-Hibri's husband got an anonymous phone call, "I'm sorry to tell you, you only have 48 hours to live."

Hibri, a corporate law professor at the University of Pennsylvania and founder of the Muslim American Bar Association, is an American citizen and a Muslim. Her husband is from Saudi Arabia.

Recounting her personal story of discrimination at a Saturday conference entitled "Islam in the Eyes of America," Hibri told the audience of approximately 200 attendees that American misperceptions of Islam, the second largest religion in the world today, are rapidly eroding the rights of American Muslims.

Along with Professor John Esposito, director of the Center for Muslim-Christian Understanding at Georgetown University and a leading American scholar on Islam, Hibri asked her audience to challenge the false notion that Islam equals fundamentalism and fundamentalism, which equals terrorism.

After reporting the life-threatening phone call against her husband to authorities, Hibri said that FBI agents all too truthfully explained to her husband and herself that to most Americans there is no difference between one Arab

Roommates to hit the Rhodes

Amherst native one of five from Harvard to win

By MICHAEL FLEEMAN
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Two roommates were among five Rhodes Scholarship winners from Harvard University and a record number of women won the prestigious academic honor, officials announced Sunday.

"Oh my God! Oh my God! We won!" screamed the answering machine message of Harvard's Matthew B. Bowyle of Shaker Heights, Ohio, and dorm roommate Alexander Johnston of Amherst, Massachusetts.

They will join 30 other Americans headed to Oxford University.

Boyle, 21, a social studies and philosophy major, is a member of the editorial boards of the Harvard Lampoon and Harvard Advocate, and serves as director of the folk music department at the school's radio station.

"I'm thrilled. I'm stupefied as well," said Boyle. "I had applied for a job at the Lil' Peach convenience store in Boston, but they rejected me."

Roommate Johnston, 21, is a social studies major who is writing his honors thesis on a Massachusetts law that makes all communities responsible for building or subsidizing some affordable housing.

Johnston is also a carpenter who has volunteered with Habitat for Humanity to help build affordable housing.

"I think it was a combination of my academic interest in housing and my work with Habitat that was interesting to them," he said of the committee that makes the awards.

The academic soul brothers were among five winners from Harvard, which led the nation in this year's Rhodes Scholarship selections. Second was Rutgers University with two winners.

Student assists soup kitchen

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN
Tanja Streidt carefully checks the recipe for a meal she prepares at Not Bread Alone, an Amherst soup kitchen.

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

While many students were still sleeping on Saturday morning recovering from the night before, sophomore communications major Tanja Streidt was devoting her time to volunteer work at the soup kitchen, Not Bread Alone, in Amherst.

This semester, Streidt was the only student from the University of Massachusetts who volunteered to help in this community service program.

"I think volunteer work is a part of life. If people have the time, they should do it. People need other people's help."
–Tanja Streidt

She originally got involved through the VIBES program on campus.

"I used to volunteer in high school and work in a soup kitchen at home. So when I got to school, I wanted to continue to volunteer.

I went to VIBES and looked through a book of different volunteer programs, and got involved that way," Streidt said.

Streidt has worked at the kitchen the entire semester every Saturday morning.

Other service groups do volunteer to help, but she is the only student who goes there on her own time.

Every Saturday, Streidt helps to prepare the food and organize the meal served to the people.

"We cook anything and everything ranging from salads to manicotti and stuffed shells.

We make main courses from food that is donated. I also help serve the food and talk to a lot of the visitors who come there, making sure everyone is fed," Streidt said.

She recently was in charge of organizing the kitchen without the help of her supervisor.

Streidt said she was asked to run the kitchen because her supervisor felt she was the most qualified and devoted.

"I opened the soup kitchen up in the morning and I had to organize the preparation of the meal," Streidt said.

"I also made sure all of the volunteers were cooking everything. I also had to clean up the place afterwards," Streidt said.

Streidt said many times when she is volunteering at the kitchen people thank her for coming.

Yet she feels her help should not be a rewarded thing.

"I think volunteer work is a part of life. If people have the time, they should do it. People do need other people's help," Streidt said.

So I just do it as a part of my life. The reward I get is the feeling of helping people. I don't do it to get something particular out of it," Striedt said.

AIDS virus is spreading among women

By KIRSTEN ANDELMAN
Collegian Correspondent

Approximately 36,690 women in America and 1,179 in Massachusetts alone are HIV positive researchers say. At a panel discussion of the Western Massachusetts Women and AIDS Network last Wednesday at Mount Holyoke College, four experts disseminated some staggering statistics and stories that systematically dispelled widely believed myths of AIDS being a homosexual male disease.

According to Michelle Murrain, a Professor of Neurobiology at Hampshire College and an authority in the field of AIDS and women, the instances of women infected with the virus is growing at an alarming rate. Nationally 15 percent of all AIDS cases are in women, with Western Massachusetts reporting a 22 percent representation. In Franklin county the number of women with AIDS jumped from 5-11 percent in one year. As of today, AIDS is the fifth largest killer of women in America.

Another disturbing component of the epidemic is the over-representation of women of color in reported AIDS cases. 74 percent of AIDS cases in women are reported to be in women of color. The vast disproportionality of this fact is apparent in that women of color comprise only 20 percent (approximately) of women nationally. In the U.S. today, AIDS is the number one killer of African-American women.

Women are 2-10 times more likely to contract the virus from men in heterosexual contact and they also experience AIDS differently than men, according to Murrain. While cervical cancer, chronic yeast infections, and other gynecological infections are common characteristics of AIDS in women, they are usually not included in bio-medical definitions of the virus.

Furthermore, most clinical trials on the virus are conducted on men, and the inclusion of women into most AIDS research is quite scarce. There is also some evidence that women respond differently to the current treatments for AIDS. According to Murrain, "Women's experience with AIDS does not reflect the definition of AIDS. Treatments for women need to be tailored for women." Because of late diagnoses due to definitive disclusion as well as differential medical treatment, the lifespan of a woman with AIDS is 1/2 to 2/3 that of a mans.

The other women on the panel included Marcia Bernett, a women infected with AIDS, Diane Palladino of AIDS Allies, and Laura Ramos, a Professor of Public Health at Hampshire College. Ramos discussed the fact that despite the fact that the Center for Disease Control holds no category for lesbians, they can and do get AIDS.

Palladino spoke of some of the legal and social difficulties faced by HIV positive women. Marcia Bernett confirmed the presence of many of these difficulties by bravely telling the story of her own experience of living with AIDS. According to Bernett, "This virus has no name, no address, no color and no religion... it's just out there and it's ready to jump out at you if you don't protect yourself."

Hillel House at UMass a community of its own

By LISA GREENFIELD
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Hillel is a Jewish living community unique from other Hillel organizations in the country, according to Rabbi Saul Perlmutter.

Perlmutter says the living community located upstairs in the Hillel House, "...is quite unique to UMass. There may be other Hillels that have a few rooms for Jewish students, but not like ours."

There is enough space in the Hillel House for 26 students. The rooms are larger than dorm rooms, carpeted, furnished and available as either doubles or singles (at a cost).

Other advantages include the proximity to campus, free utilities, free use of a kitchenette and access to laundry machines.

Perlmutter said most students do not realize that housing is available at Hillel, not only during fall and spring semesters, but during summer and intersession. He said the fall semester filled up so quickly that he expects the intersession and summer will also fill.

Students living in Hillel agree on a sense of homeyness and security in the house.

Josh Slomich, who lives in the house describes it as "a good environment, cozy, home-like, not like the 'beehive' in the dorms. You feel as if you're a part of a community, not just a faceless student in a dorm. You don't feel like an outsider."

The students accepted to live in the house must show a strong interest in Jewish life, either in participating in it or learning.

The residents have access to a kosher kitchenette, which gives any student unfamiliar with kosher rules an opportunity to learn.

Thursday lunch, Friday dinner and Sunday lunch and dinner are prepared downstairs at the kosher kitchen and residents are welcomed to attend.

Sharing is also an emphasized fact of house living. In the past, students have held activities such as video nights,

Amherst Festival of Lights a fun-filled event yet again

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

Young children's laughter and Christmas carols rang through the air Friday night during annual Amherst Festival of Lights co-sponsored by Amherst Chamber of Commerce and UMass' Interfraternity and Panhellenic Councils.

Late Friday afternoon an array of Amherst residents ranging from families with young children to high school and college students gathered at the town green to listen to Christmas carols, drink hot cider and wait for the UMass Marching Band to escort Santa Claus to the festivities.

Before Santa came the Amherst Junior High School Chorus entertained the crowd of about 500 with such songs as "Noel," and "Silent Night." While they were singing, excited children ran around holding their candles out to be lit by their mother or father or just checking out the guy with all the pretty balloons. But, what was the mission for all of these children?

"I really wanna see Santa, he's cool," said nine-year-old Rebecca of Amherst.

Then, off in the distance, one could hear the UMass drumline and the other 250 plus band members approaching the green with the big man himself. Amid delightful screams and applause the marching band performed "Greensleeves," "Sleighride," "Rudolph the Red-nosed Reindeer," and other memorable Christmas carols.

This is the second year that the UMass Greeks have helped sponsor the event. They sold hot cider, passed out candles or just walked around making sure everything was going all right.

Steve Ziolkowski, an Alpa Tau Gamma brother and president of the Interfraternity Council said, "It's a really nice thing to do for the Amherst community."

African studies becoming very popular subject

By JANET KERLIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — More scholars are exploring Africa than ever before, with students lured not only by crisis on the continent but also Africa's cultural riches.

Pulsating Afro-pop music and vibrant art have fired student interest in African countries in the late 80s, as much as news media attention to the Ethiopian famine, South African human rights abuses, Somalian civil war and other political issues, said James McCann, director of the African Studies Center at Boston University.

"Even though Africa is in crisis over political instability and food, Africa's cultural production has never been more popular or more recognized," McCann said. "In 1960 you never would have heard music from Ghana or Zaire on the radio in Boston."

One measure of interest in African studies is the 36th annual meeting of the Atlanta-based international African Studies Association, being held in Boston through Tuesday.

In 1958, the ASA conference drew fewer than 100 people. This year, at least 1,700 are attending what is widely recognized as the largest gathering of African specialists in the world.

The bulk of American universities with African studies programs are celebrating 30 years of African scholarship. Most of these programs started with seed money given by the federal government in the early '60s, McCann said.

"It's a fledgling branch of academic life compared to some others. In some places, they're just now getting their first African scholar," McCann said.

"Now more and more places include Africa as a regular part of their curriculum, or offer courses in African anthropology or art or history," he said.

"When I first taught African history at BU in 1984, there were 14 students. Now there's over 100," McCann said.

U.S. programs are stronger than anywhere else in the world, said ASA president David Robinson of Michigan State University, because they get financial support from state governments and alumni rather than depending on federal funds.

tion and defense, the court is likely to hear from some of Porter's victims. State law and court rules in Massachusetts give crime victims an opportunity to make their case to the judge before sentencing.

Porter worked at parishes in North Attleboro, Fall River and New Bedford in Massachusetts.

In 1967, he entered a church-run program for pedophiles in New Mexico. He later was assigned to a church in Bemidji, Minn., but left in 1970 and retired from the priesthood.

Since the Porter case and others involving sexual abuse of children by clergy, the church has adopted stronger policies to deal with abusers.

At its annual meeting last month, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops adopted a policy to make it easier to dismiss priests who have committed sexual abuse of children.

Brady Law marks essential shift in gun control policy

Imagine that a man is released from a psychiatric institution because there just wasn't enough money to take care of him anymore. Imagine that, in a fit of insanity, this man walks into a store and comes out with a gun. Imagine that he takes this gun and blows a hole through your father, your mother, or your best friend.

Imagine that the reason this happened is because of the indefensible paranoia that a five-day waiting period on the purchase of a gun will take away the ability of a citizen to protect her or himself. Imagine that this tragedy persists because of the piles of cash handed to unscrupulous members of Congress by an over-wealthy lobby made up mainly of hunters and gamesmen.

Which is more insane — the lunatic with a gun, or the system that lets him have it?

This story is not a fantasy; it has happened to hundreds of Americans, and it is what happened to a woman who stood beside President Clinton on Tuesday, November 30, 1993. Mark that date; it belongs to history now.

It was last Tuesday that Clinton finally signed into law a measure known as the Brady Bill, named for Reagan press secretary James Brady, who has been confined to a wheelchair since he was hit by a bullet in the attempt on Reagan's life in 1981. This bill — this law — that has confounded the National Rifle Association for so long, and rallied the conservative movement to passionate anger, will have this effect on the United States:

You will have to wait five days to purchase a gun, so that your record can be checked. Period. That's it. In many areas, it takes longer than that to get a fishing license.

Peter
ORVETTI

The opposition to this relatively minor change has been overwhelming, but difficult to understand. Why not? Is it really an infringement on anyone's rights to have to wait 120 hours so that innocent lives may be spared? Of course not. NRA-fattened Republicans in the Senate even had to concede this point and gave up their ridiculous fight against this very logical idea. There is absolutely no sound argument against the Brady Bill.

In Delaware, a similar law has halted 1,271 gun purchases over the last two years that would have gone to could-be criminals. Think of that: at least 1,271 people might have been shot by guns legally sold to criminals because some member of the NRA couldn't wait five days to buy a gun. And that's just in tiny Delaware, with a population of about one million. Expand that total to the 250 million people in the U.S. That is quite a few bodies shot down, and all because someone couldn't wait.

The Brady Law will be effective. Just ask that woman who stood beside Bill Clinton when he signed it into law. Or ask any police officer, or even most members of the NRA. A survey a few years ago showed that a large majority of the NRA membership favors such a law. Even gun devotees realize how logical it is.

The Brady Law was fought against by the fanatics in the highest ranks of the NRA, and no one else. Why did the fight last so long? The NRA has too much money, and has bought too many members of Congress. The gun lobby should not own Congress, and they should not keep control by threatening pro-gun control representatives with defeat in the next election. But they do run Congress, and they will keep on running Congress, as long as well-meaning but misinformed Americans keep sending in their checks.

Five days is too long to wait? Just ask James Brady. He's been waiting for justice for 12 years — in a wheelchair, never to walk again.

Peter Orvetti is a Collegian columnist

Of omens and weirdness

"Onr Hunter, who art in Owl Farm, Thompson be thy name. thy kingdom come, thy will be done, on Earth as it is in Owl Farm. Give us this day our daily crank, and forgive us our, well, ahem, 'run-ins with local law enforcement' as we forgive those wrongheaded meek scum who seek to incarcerate us. And lead us not into Long Island, but deliver us from evil." — Ron Hargen

In mid-December of 1992 I was standing on a balcony in Orchard Hill with a lovely young woman. We were waiting for a car to arrive and take us on a great adventure. I noticed a fox moving south across the grass just below the Freaks-Only parking lot; it was more of a skeleton than a fox, almost no meat on the bones, moving fast and low, starving, lonely, terrified, and vicious.

Chris
PETROPOLOUS

"Look at the fox." I said.

"Yeah," she said.

At the time, I didn't believe in omens, so I let this obvious harbinger of doom slide, and I took no precautions.

Two months later armed UMass thugs jumped, drugged, abducted, experimented on, and finally just beat me senseless, leaving me half alive in the middle of route 202 with nothing but a fifth of Dewar's and a six-pack of Iron City beer. Undaunted, I crawled the 40 odd miles to Moose Hill, locked all the doors, and stayed blissfully drunk until June.

But I am not a vengeful man. I do not want to dwell on that ugliness.

From June to October I lived and worked in the Realworld, that hazy, frightening otherplace outside UMass' corpulent womb senior columnists write about with hushed tones one time too many during a semester. I found it better than UMass, less vague and fully satisfying. It was a refreshing change.

However, in late September I began having terrible nightmares consisting of a bloated she-beast chasing me down Salvador Dali corridors, pelting me with bile and blood and good old-fashioned Add-Drop forms, screeching in a language I did not understand. I would wake freezing and the scars across my back would throb.

I remembered what happened the last time I ignored an omen, and so I realized I had to return.

In November I drove out here with a fifth of Dewar's and a six-pack of Iron City beer and parked in the Freaks-Only lot. I took one step onto the actual campus and all at once there were air raid sirens and ooze dispensers and siege engines and goons in black suits, and the sky boiled and a freak with a bible and ragged hair came up to me and spoke.

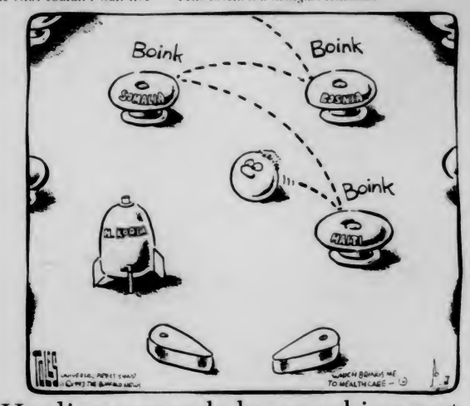
"When the going gets weird, the weird turn pro." And he was gone. A thousand snakes with wings roared out of the low clouds. Everyone had three faces for a moment. Ice melted and then froze again into even more tortuous shapes.

That is the ugliness I wish to draw attention to. Any sense of security that one gets from being in this place and this process is false. The smart ones put on blinders and get the hell out after four years, welcoming the arena where performance — rather, excellence — is all that is required of them, not deciphering the words of bureaucrats, not smiling when ordered to smile, not weakly and fraudulently playing the game that these years are the grandest of all.

Chris Petropolous is a UMass student.

Buying a gun is not that simple

This a rebuttal to the column by Corey S. Puckett [Collegian, Dec. 1]. The laws in Massachusetts are such that one cannot simply "draw out the shiny Mastercard" and valid driver's license and purchase a firearm. Let me tell you a short story.



At age 15 I took what is called the "Massachusetts Hunter Safety Program." This program met eight times for 3 hour sessions. That is 24 hours of instruction on firearms safety, including pistols, rifles, shotguns and bows. After completion of this course I had to apply for a firearms identification card (FID). I had to pay a fee which covers a criminal background check through the FBI and registration with the state. At 18 I applied for my pistol permit.

After the application was submitted the usual registration and criminal check were run for an even higher fee. Then I had to wait six months, with continual visits to the town police to see if it had come in yet. In other words, I had to play their game.

Along with Massachusetts' strict laws concerning gun control, the Brady Law helps by creating a "waiting period," and also strengthens the inadequate laws of the more conservative states.

I'm sorry for the ignorant people that cringe when they hear the word semi-automatic, but that's another issue, as are deer population control and hunting accidents. Yes Mr. Puckett, "the sun will shine brightly," not when honest, hard woking people are forced from their jobs, but when people are no longer ignorant when it comes to the use of firearms and the laws concerning them. I'm proud to take part in my heritage, and I will continue to exercise my constitutional rights.

Healing wounds by speaking out

Almost any day of the week you can pick up a newspaper and find a report of a woman attacked, a wife beaten, a daughter molested. In the majority of cases they are attacked by men and the incident reported by a neighbor or a hospital. It is called violence toward women and it happens in every culture, in every country, on every block. In my case, it happened in my own high school and like the majority of women I did nothing about it for a long time. I kept silent. Why? Why do women not speak up about the violence?

When I was attacked three years ago, I was offered a long list of excuses by friends of my attacker and by the faculty of my school. 'John's' friends did not want to see John get into trouble and the school did not want the bad press. So, in the days that followed my attack I was filled in on the details of John's life.

I was told that he had a bad family life; that whenever John got into trouble, his mother would cover for him and take the blame on herself, so John never learned to deal with authority. I was told he was having trouble in school and that if I reported him he would be expelled and the school would be unable to help him. I was told how his father was too demanding, how John did drugs, how he drank. I was told that his father hit his mother and he had not learned that was not proper behavior. The school could help him if he was allowed to stay. Last of all, I was told that I was over-reacting, it hadn't been that bad. I would heal.

I listened to all this while still in shock. Somewhere inside I wanted to hide and never think about that day again. I did not want his friends to be angry with me and I did not want to be responsible for his expulsion. Most of all I did not want him angry with me. So, I was allowed to do and say nothing. In fact, I was encouraged to do nothing. John attacked me, and he never served so much as a detention.

Then I realized something. John's excuses were just that, excuses. I realized that I had let myself fall into the trap I swore I would never fall into. I let people intimidate me out of telling the truth. I let myself down. I would not be expelling John, he had done that to himself. Any punishment John had to face, had been brought upon himself. He had, unprovoked, caused me physical and mental harm, and I had let it go.

In the beginning, just after I was attacked, I thought that to forget would be least painful, I had been through enough. Now I wonder if I had dealt with it then, would I have the nightmares. I wonder if I would be so nervous when men come up behind me or if I would react so strongly when someone puts his hands, even gently, on my neck.

When John went unpunished for his crime, the school and I told him that his actions were excusable. Yet someone paid — me. I know why women don't speak out about the violence. They feel that they have already lived through their attack and they don't need to live through it again.

Also, they are afraid to anger their attacker. They need support and encouragement to speak up about the attack because all they want to do is hide and forget. I know we can't forget. We have to stand together and tell the world that violence toward women, children and men is unacceptable and the first step is to speak out. Until we do that, we can never heal.

Crime stats are murder

Killings up, other crimes down in N.E.

By JOHN DIAMOND
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Murder increased in the first half of this year while other forms of crime declined in Southern New England's major cities, the federal Bureau of Investigation reported Sunday.

Figures kept by cities and compiled as part of the FBI's annual Uniform Crime Reports show a startlingly similar pattern in cities in Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut with populations above 100,000.

In nearly every case, there were more murders in the first six months of this year than the same period last year, while instances of other crimes declined. How much weight to give murder statistics is difficult to gauge. In some cases, the number of murders from year to year is so small that any change up or down is statistically insignificant.

But overall, cities from Boston to Providence, R.I., to Bridgeport, Conn., followed the national trend. The FBI found no statistically significant change in the murder rate nationwide and reported declines in every other category of crime.

The FBI noted that the "good news" of declining crime must be balanced against a realization that these were modest decreases from record high levels. In all cases, the FBI listed tabulated reports of crime rather than crimes solved.

"The small reported declines may be positive, but I doubt most Americans will draw much comfort from them because the levels of violent crime and drug trafficking remain so staggering," said FBI Director Louis J. Freeh. "It is government's great task to reduce crime sharply and permanently."

In seven southern New England cities for which complete figures were available, murders increased from 81 in the first half to 1992 to 138 in the first half of this year.

Murders increased in Boston with 44 reported from January through June of this year, compared to 27 over the same period in 1992. Forcible rapes increased slightly from 232 to 247. Every other category reported by Boston declined, including aggravated assault, burglary, larceny and car theft.

Burglary includes house breaks. Larceny includes shoplifting and other forms of nonviolent stealing.

Robbery, which includes muggings and other thefts directly from a person by force, dropped sharply in Boston from 2,370 to 1,688, a 29 percent decrease. Boston did not report a figure for arson.

Bridgeport reported a slight increase in murders from 27 in the first half of 1992 to 32 in the first six months of the year. That pattern is continuing. By year's end, Bridgeport is expected to surpass its record of 63 homicides. Although Bridgeport is one-fourth the size of Boston, the two cities have comparable number of murders.

Rapes also increased in Bridgeport from 32 to 45. Robbery, assaults, burglary, larceny and car theft all decreased slightly. Arson increased from 78 incidents to 97.

Gary Lopez, a crime analyst for the Connecticut State Police, said statewide figures show the same trend: "Crime is going down in most of the categories except murder. . . .It's a trend in crime throughout the United States."

Hartford reported seven murders compared to six in the first half of last year — a statistically insignificant change. All other categories of crime decreased. The sharpest drop in property crimes was for car theft, down 1,545 from 1,983 a year earlier, a drop of 22 percent. Rapes declined by 29 percent from 69 to 48.

But in terms of the rate of crimes per 100,000 people, Hartford led the other southern New England cities in larceny and had the highest overall crime rate.

BARNSTABLE, Mass. (AP)—A Cape Cod man surrendered to police in Wellfleet Sunday, hours after his wife was found slain in their Hyannis home and two weeks before he was to stand trial for allegedly assaulting her.

Steven Robbins, 29, turned himself in to police just before 1 p.m. about 50 miles east of Hyannis, where police had found his estranged wife dead earlier in the day, said Barnstable police Sgt. Bernard Jenkins.

"She was on the couch and apparently had been hit with a baseball bat and stabbed with a knife," said Barnstable County District Attorney Philip Rollins.

Neighbors say Kathy Robbins, 25, had moved out earlier in the week. She returned to the home early Sunday with the couple's two young daughters. When police were called to the home by a relative about 8:30 a.m., neither Steven Robbins nor the children were there, Jenkins said.

Robbins brought the two girls along when he surrendered in Wellfleet, Jenkins said. They were turned over to relatives.

It was not the first time police responded to a call at the Robbins home. On Aug. 5, Robbins was arrested and charged with assault and battery on his wife. He was scheduled for trial in Barnstable District Court Dec. 20.

NORTH BROOKFIELD, Mass (AP)—Police said Sunday they believe a skull found by hunters belongs to a man whose body was found last month in a neighboring town.

Robert Bedard, 66, of North Brookfield, disappeared while hunting in late April 1992. Bedard, a diabetic and in poor health, was the subject of an extensive search.

Police Chief Nelson Barrett Jr. said a torso was found in November 1992 without a head, just over the town line in Spencer.

The skull —which was missing the lower jaw— was found by hunters Thursday in a wooded area near Hines Bridge Road.

All-male calendar promotes multiculturalism

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

If you are looking to give a holiday gift that encompasses artistic value, human interest, sex appeal and good, old fashioned student ingenuity, you need not look further than outside the Blue Wall cafe.

Photographer Quentin Stewart will be selling the 1994 University Calendar, an all-male, multicultural student-produced calendar that may forever change the way you see some of your fellow students.

"There is great diversity in this calendar," said model/collaborator Zacharie Isch. "People [the models] are from all parts of the globe."

Isch, a sophomore at University of Massachusetts, collaborated with the calendar's producer, Mike Babalola, a junior Legal Studies major and model. The two said that multiculturalism is a major focus of the calendar, and hope that exposure to visually pleasing diversity will help to teach students that beauty takes on many different forms.

"Everyone looks good, that's it," said Isch. "It's really pretty simple."

The 12 models featured in the calendar are all students here at UMass from various ethnic and racial backgrounds. The models, of African, American/Caucasian, Armenian, Asian, French, Jamaican and South American background were selected by a survey of women on the campus center concourse.

Babalola came up with the idea for the calendar after hearing about one that was published by Stewart a couple of years ago. Babalola said he felt that the same idea could be improved upon and followed through to create an even better product.

"This school is a multicultural school. Most of the calendars you see out now are all white men and women. We tried to get as many different types of guys in here, just to get something different from what you'll see in stores," said Babalola.

Campus Design and Copy was contacted by Babalola to subcontract with an off-campus company to handle the actual production. Meanwhile, Babalola constructed a network of friends and acquaintances to model.

After the selection of models was narrowed to 12, Babalola, Isch and the others began a two-month photo shoot with Stewart. Photos were shot in the local area, many to suit the seasons or weather of the months they represent.

Both Babalola and Isch are satisfied with the final result, although modest about the prospect of fame. Some might think that, after having been featured in a calendar of this nature, the models' egos would shoot sky-high, but such is not the case.

"You look at it and think, 'It's not me,'" said Isch. "It just feels strange."

"I model anyways, so I'm used to it already," said Babalola, who, like Isch, was clad in a baseball hat at the time of the interview. Neither is quite yet used to the recognition that they are already receiving from the few that have actually seen the calendar.

"All three of us don't want to be on the cover, we cringe at the thought," added Isch, who emphasized that the models, especially, have to look at the calendar objectively in order to produce a work of artistic quality.

Babalola and Isch pointed out that an all-male calendar is long overdue, in light of the numerous works featuring women that are for sale. Both agreed that as the calendar's focus was to present the human body in an artistic, visually pleasing way, it promoted equality among the sexes.

"As long as it's tastefully done, it depicts people not as objects, but just as people," said Isch.

The 1994 University Calendar will be on sale today until the end of the semester at Quentin Stewart's table on the concourse. The calendar costs under $10; a specific price was not available at press time.

Ensemble seeks help

New World Theater invites students

By JUAN JOSE CHACON QUIROS
Collegian Staff

In the words of Ricardo Khan, Director of Crossroads Theater Company, "the New World Theater is a soul to which all artist should aspire, of not just an American society but of a world society."

The New World Theater is now seeking support from students of the Five College community. "The New World Theater gives representation to people of color in the field of theater," said Suncear Scretchen, coordinator of the Ensemble supporting the New World Theater.

The New World Theater was founded in 1979 in order to present the dramatic works of people of color as a vibrant and important element of contemporary theater. Since then this organization has presented more than one hundred pieces of theater.

According to Suncear "anyone who's interested in Theater and experiencing other cultures is invited to join the ensemble." The ensemble is a group of people from various different cultures who give their support for multicultural theater. You can participate by writing, acting, backstage support, hospitality, and various other activities.

The New World Theater presents four performances per semester, one of them an original piece. It provides students with the opportunity to develop their acting and technical skills. Students have the chance to work with emergent young professionals to artists of international stature.

According to Suncear, in the past "artists who have worked with the theater include writers James Baldwin and Alice Childress, choreographers Pearl Primus and Roberto Borrell and actor Gordon Heath".

The New World Theater is affiliated to the Fine Arts Center and is associated with Amherst, Hampshire, Mt. Holyoke and Smith Colleges.

"Membership to the New World Theater provides some privileges. Every semester there are trips to see plays in the New York, New Jersey area. In addition to that tickets to the New World Theater productions are free," said Suncear.

The group has many projects for next season. According to Suncear "we are producing a student written and performed skits. Last semester "Word!" was a similar experience, very successful, and that's why we decided to do it again."

The New World Theater gives students opportunity to earn credit by doing production work. There's also a one credit colloquim, which consists in attending all the plays and then critiquing them.

Whether you like to share some of the diversity of the New World Theater or you just want to have some fun, the Ensemble supporting the New World Theater is an exciting experience. If you want more information call their office at 545-1972.

Their first performance of the year, by Endesha Ida Mae Holland, will take place February 11 and its entitled "From the Mississippi Delta."

Wide array of musical talent makes Tanglewood-like fun

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

With a variation of acoustic guitar performers, some blankets, snacks and an atmosphere filled with glow in the dark stickers shaped like stars, a feeling of Tanglewood is going to be brought to the University of Massachusetts.

Tuesday, Dec. 7, the Residential Arts program Out of Bounds, is putting on a production called "It Ain't Tanglewood." The concert will take place in the Wheeler Gallery between 7:30-9:30.

Dianne Bilyak, director of the program, explained the concert is going to be a "collaboration of whatever people do. The performers will come and play whatever style they want. Each player will be playing for a twenty minute slot."

One of the acoustic guitar players who will be performing is Robert "Chappy" Shapiro. Shapiro is a junior psychology major here at UMass. He has been playing the acoustic guitar for eight years. Tomorrow night he will be singing as well as playing. Shapiro will perform songs from artist such as Neil Young and Paul Simon and Art Garfunkel.

Brad Potter will also be performing, playing the acoustics along with Samantha Smith on vocals. Both Potter and Smith are students at the University and have one semester left. Potter is an English major and Smith is a pre-vet major. Potter has been playing for 12 years, and has been playing with Smith for over a year now. The two have performed on campus before in places such as Earth Foods and the Wheeler Gallery. They also play for Student Valley Productions. Potter and Smith will be playing all originals which are influenced by the late '70s sounds of Genesis and Pink Floyd.

Randy Gigliotti, who part-time models for an artist in Florence as well as for art classes here at the University, will be playing solo acoustic on a finger style guitar. He is currently living in Northhampton and is trying to get involved and network with other musicians. Gigliotti will not be singing, but performing both original and non-original songs. He will be playing some blues songs influenced by ragtime, jazz, Bob Dylan and the Grateful Dead.

"The Crossing" will also be performing Tuesday night. Many people may be familiar with this group because they played weekly at Twisters last spring semester. The members of the band are Peter Win, a sophomore English major, Amy MacDougal, a junior journalism-communications major and Brian Syrjala, a junior economics major. They have been together for over a year now. The group will be performing all cover songs which are mostly pop and blues. Win will be playing the acoustic guitar and MacDougal will be singing. Syrjala will be both singing and playing. Songs such as "These Are The Days" by 10,000 Maniacs and "Ain't Never Loved A Man" by the Commitments will be performed.

The last performer will be Max Cohen. He will be singing and playing the acoustics himself. All of the songs he will be performing are composed by himself.

The Wheeler Gallery will be decorated with lawn chairs and blankets, and will provide all of the pleasure that Tanglewood does. Yet most of all, it will be where an array of talent will be performed.

Techno-grooves & hushed romance

There's still a home for techno/industrial, whatever you want to call it, music. Building on a 12 year, but not exactly storied history, Front 242 mix steady and reliable electronic drumbeats with random and occasionally spastic vocals.

The two versions of "Animal" lace 05:22:09:12 OFF with vocals which surge in and out seemingly with the producer's turn of the dial. This isn't sleepytime listening. Charged and electric, tunes like "Skin" use a more traditional techno-type groove. Female vocals are a welcome addition on "Happiness" where they echo like angels.

Falling somewhere between Trent Reznor and house, Front 242 aren't a Top 10 band, but they do have a place. B (Adam Goulston)

Scrapbook of Madness
Polyphemus
Beggars Banquet

Seldom do repeated listens of an album make it seem worse. Yet subjecting yourself to Scrapbook of Madness repeatedly, and the resemblance to everything from Cream to Steve Miller to Boston becomes visible. And this is alternative. Polyphemus are a tapestry of '60s and '70s music on CD.

"The Sea Map" comes straight out of Disraeli Gears but with a slick new sound. It's driven and kinda cool but not cool enough to be groovy. I guess everything old is new again. C+ (A.G.)

Pale Sun, Crescent Moon
Cowboy Junkies
RCA

Painted with the vocals of Margo Timmins, the Junkies' musical meditations are like a soft brush on the cheek. Pale Sun, Crescent Moon is a documentary of solid and stable romance told in hushed subtlety.

"Crescent Moon," casts Timmins in a soft glow. Her restrained vocals dance over brother Michael Timmins wispy guitar. The first single, "Anniversary Song" is a playful interaction of Michael's bouncy guitar twanging and Margo's vocals which in this tune come across as a less-cynical Natalie Merchant.

"Cold Tea Blues" is an entirely simple metaphor on love. But it's one of the warmest, most endearing little sentiments that a guitar and voice can produce.

If the world were a fair place, Margo would be at my bedside every night singing me to sleep. A- (A.G.)

and another. She said that they further advised and that for their own safety, if they wear their national dress, they should "pull down the shades."

In addition to such frightening incidents of discrimination, Hibri said that Muslims also face prejudices in the American legal system and political realm. In defending themselves before judges and juries, who are also prone to popular misconceptions, Hibri said that Muslims have "to surmount a movie."

"In these United States we should not have to worry about this kind of discrimination," Hibri said.

Jack G. Shaheen, a free lance journalist, writer, and professor of mass communications at Southern Illinois University, supported Hibri's assertions, citing Hollywood's string of recent movies consistently stereotype Arabs and Muslims as irrational radicals and terrorists.

Shaheen said that in the media today, "the boogey person is really the Arab Muslim."

According to Shaheen, popular action movies such as "Iron Eagle" and "Delta Force" further exaggerate American misconceptions of what Arabs and Muslims are really like.

Shaeen continued, saying that popular documentaries on Islam stereotype Islam and Muslims as innately violent by their very titles, such as "The Sword of Islam," "The Fire of Islam," and "The Dagger of Islam."

Esposito criticized how little Americans know about Islam, as being a major contributor the vulnerability Americans have for such unfounded stereotyping.

"We assume that people in the world have at least heard of Christianity and Jesus," Esposito said, but Americans, priding themselves as belonging to an educated society, know very little about Islam.

Mainstream Islam, like mainstream Christianity and Judaism, is a religion of faith in one God. Like Christianity, Islam accepts Jesus as a great prophet and son of the virgin Mary. The Qur'an (Koran), Islam's holy book, holds both Christians and Jews in regard as "People of the book."

According to all three scholars, the solutions to American discrimination against Muslims lies in education and increased responsibility in the mass communications industry.

Jack G. Shaheen

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

Shaheen concluded his discussion with some optimism, "Given my faith in the younger generation, these stereotypes will be overcome."

Like Shaheen, Hibri has hope for American perceptions of Islam in the future. The basis of her hope is the Constitution of the United States, and the inalienable rights to freedom of religion and speech that it represents for all Americans.

Hibri said that in the same way that African Americans and women fought for their rights in the 1960s, so must American Muslims form their own civil rights movement. She concluded optimistically, "my faith in the Constitution is unshakable."

gum in his clothing. But he said he never mentioned the incidents to school administrators, believing he wouldn't get any support.

"I just began hating myself more and more," he testified before a special governor's commission that drafted the civil rights legislation.

The bill says no one shall be discriminated against in a public school or have his or her studies interfered with on account of sexual orientation. It has passed the House and Senate and awaits final enactment in both chambers before moving to Gov. William F. Weld, who has supported the proposal.

"If there's one place where none of this belongs, it's in the schools," said Sen. Robert Havern, D-Arlington, who sponsored the legislation in the Senate. "Schools should be talking broadening our horizons."

Massachusetts in 1989, became the second state, after Wisconsin, to enact a gay rights law that banned discrimination against homosexuals in housing, credit and employment. But activists said it did not cover the school setting.

Some individual school systems already have gay rights policies. But no state in the country has adopted such a policy as law, said George Neighbors, a spokesman for Parents, Families and Friends of Lesbians and Gays, an international organization based in Washington, D.C.

"It could have national implications," he said. "It might lead to a direction for other states to follow."

Some opponents, however, say it isn't necessary to single out homosexual students for such legal protection.

"The civil rights of all citizens are already protected by our current law," said Sen. Marian Walsh, D-Boston, who voted against the bill.

C.J. Doyle, executive director of the state Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, said the law would be a "steppingstone" to introducing programs in schools that will "affirm the homosexual lifestyle."

Doyle said he was concerned that schools would be forced to teach about gay writers or the gay rights movement, lessons that he said would abridge the rights of students who believe homosexuality is immoral for religious reasons.

The Massachusetts Association of School Superintendents took no position on the bill, although it supported some of the ideas behind it, said Peter Finn, executive director of the group.

"We certainly think one of the first responsibilities we have to make is to make an environment in school where every student feels safe and welcome," he said.

But school hasn't always been a haven for students such as Mark DeLellis. He said when he was on the soccer team in middle school, fellow students once surrounded him, shouted names, spit at him and hurled dog feces at him.

apple picking, Succah decorating and holiday celebrations.

There is a possibility of either one residential assistant or two people sharing the role. Hillel resident, Aaron Weinberger said, "there's always a person around to lend a hand. Its a real community — we help each other out."

Perlmutter said, "Hillel offers Jewish students a place to really live in a Jewish atmosphere: to learn about each other and feel a level of safety — not just physical, but support and nurturance that's hard to find elsewhere."

In the past he recalls that Jews from Russia, Israel, Iran, France and Denmark as well as non-Jewish Japanese students shared their cultures with other residents.

Residents in this particular community have the advantage of living in the house, which is open to all students, they have access to the lounge, a library and the space of the house.

Security is not a problem. Each resident has keys for the outside door as well as the upstairs leading to the living area. Otherwise the residential area is locked to anyone using the house.

Sophomores (with housing exemptions), juniors, seniors and graduate students can all live in the house.

"The Jewish living community is a place where people from different backgrounds can bond and experience Jewish culture together. There is a mutual understanding among the residents that distinguishes Hillel from any dorm," said resident Diana Cohen.

"The only way we will get better is if we play the best teams in the nation" — Minutewoman coach Joanie O'Brien

To see the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team's schedule depicts just how far the Minutewomen have come in such a short time.

The Minutewomen played at No. 15 Ohio State two weekends ago, losing to the NCAA runner-up Buckeyes 97-66. They host Vanderbilt on January 2 at the Mullins Center, another Final Four participant of last season. Also, there is a chance that the Minutewomen will play 1993 NCAA National Champion Texas Tech in the St. Peter's Tournament on December 28-29.

Needless to say, the Minutewomen are bound to improve.

The Minutewomen are coming off an 11-15 season (6-8 in conference play), one of the best in school history, and an improvement over the two previous years (4-51 overall).

The reasons for the improvement? Coach O'Brien, in her third season as Minutewoman coach, is one. O'Brien has been more succesful than her 15-39 overall record can attest to. What the record does not show is what O'Brien has done for the future of the Minutewoman program.

That leads to another reason — recruiting. Last year, O'Brien's successful recruiting led to four freshmen starting for the Minutewomen. This year, two Minutewomen are starting as freshmen.

The four sophomores, Melissa Gurile, Octavia Thomas, Tricia Hopson and Kim Gregory, formed a strong nucleus during the 1992-93 season that should only improve this year.

Gurile, a 6-foot-3 center, led the Minutewomen in scoring (14.0), rebounding (8.3), and blocked a school-record 52 shots in claiming the ECAC Rookie of the Year. Gurile, who worked hard in the off-season to improve her game, should challenge for A-10 honors at center.

Thomas, a 5-foot-9 small forward, garnered the A-10 Rookie of the Year award, and was easily the most consistent player on the Minutewoman squad. Thomas averaged 13.6 ppg and 8.1 rebounds last season.

This season, Thomas has started off strong, scoring a career-high 31 points in the Ohio State tilt. Thomas, like Gurile, has polished her play and will also be up for the All A-10 team.

"After the Ohio State game, we realized that we have two players (Gurile and Thomas) who can play with anyone in the country," said O'Brien. "The two of them did everything that we could have asked them to do. Both kids just stepped up to the challenge."

The frontcourt will also feature freshman Crystal Carroll and senior Maleeka Valentine. The 6-foot-2 Carroll from Watervliet, NY, will fill the void of graduated senior Kim Kristofik at power forward.

While the Minutewomen will benefit from a physical Carroll, they will also profit from the defensive play of 5-foot-9 senior Maleeka Valentine (3.6 ppg, 2.5 rpg).

"Our frontcourt is one of our strong points," said O'Brien. "Mel and Octavia and Crystal — we got three solid post players, kids who can play around the basket. Whether we need to chase the ball down on the offensive end or don't let them get any offensive rebounds, we need to outrebound our opponents."

As for the backcourt, the 5-foot-6 Hopson (3.9 ppg, 3.9 apg) will run the point for the Minutewomen. Hopson, voted co-captain by her teammates, injured her ankle in practice during the preseason, and, despite playing in the 52-44 win against Northeastern, is still recovering. When Hopson is 100 percent, the Minutewoman offense should run smoothly.

"First and foremost, we have to take care of the ball," said O'Brien. "Handling the ball has been our Achilles' heel, and it's something that if we don't take care of it now, it's going to be our Achilles' heel this year also."

Gregory and freshman Beth Kuzmeski are vying for the starting shooting guard position. Gregory was the team's top three-point shooter last season, averaging 7.8 ppg and 3.9 rpg. Kuzmeski, a 5-foot-7 guard out of Northampton, Mass., has an outstanding perimeter game.

While Kuzmeski figures to play at the two guard, she will also back Hopson at point. When Hopson was hurt during the first two games, Kuzmeski showed poise as she stepped in at point guard. Also seeing some time in the backcourt will be 5-foot-8 senior Cherie Muza, 5-foot-8 junior Cass Anderson, and 5-foot-7 sophomore Nicole Carter.

Gurile a force inside for Minutewomen

By Andrew Bryce
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

A sign of good things to come.

It was Melissa Gurile's first collegiate game for the University of Massachusetts, at the Curry Hicks Cage. It was not Watkins Memorial High School in Pataskala, Ohio, Gurile's alma mater. It was different. It was tougher. It was more physical. It was the big time.

Unfortunately for the Northeastern Huskies, it was Gurile's time, also, as she poured in a still-standing career high of 34 points and 15 rebounds, lust 40 minutes of college hoops and already, Gurile had found a way to dominate. From the outset of her collegiate career, just two years young, the 6-foot-2 sophomore has proved to be one of the top centers in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

"I think that started Mel," said Minutewoman Coach Joanie O'Brien. "I think that also forced people to respect her. You don't just score 34 points. It's not something that just happens."

"I was kinda' nervous (playing in my first college game)," said Gurile. "I didn't know what to expect. I heard it was so aggressive and so tough, which it was. I was kind of concerned how I was going to play with the aggressive style that it is in college.

"I just tried to think that everybody else was in the same boat (four of her teammates were freshmen, also). We were all nervous, so I know I wasn't alone. That kind of helped."

That boat kind of took sail, and the Minutewomen, led by Gurile and teammate Octavia Thomas, finished 11-15 on the season. It was the best record for a UMass women's hoop team since the 1988-89 team went 11-18, and included a respectable 6-8 record in Atlantic-10 play.

Gurile played a major role in the turnaround, doing what any coach could ask from a freshman center. Putting the ball in the basket? Gurile led the Minutewomen in scoring with 14.0 ppg. How about rebounding? Gurile again with an 8.3 average. Blocked shots? None other than Gurile, who set the UMass record for blocks in a season with 52 blocks, breaking the previous record of 51 set by Martha Ready in 1981-82.

For her exceptional first year, Gurile was awarded the 1993 ECAC Rookie of the Year. Quite an accomplishment for both Gurile and the Minutewomen. Teammate Thomas also had a great first year in wrapping up the A-10 Rookie of the Year. Two freshmen garnering the top awards for freshmen from the same team. For Gurile, it was no big deal.

"Individual awards mean nothing to me," said Gurile. "I think they are great if my teammates get them. Just having five freshmen only made us all better.

"I mean, it was a nice honor, but I have always thought it takes more than one person to win a ballgame. That's obvious in basketball. I just hope my teammates get a little more recognition, because they deserve it, like Trish (Hopson) and Kim Gregory and Octavia."

An ultimate team player, the sincerely modest Gurile does not let all the accolades go to her head. Instead of basking in the glory of honors, Gurile worked hard in

Melissa Gurile looks to continue her tremendous inside play for the Minutewoman basketball team this season

No fluke for Thomas

Soph forward goes after another super year

By Sean P. Hayden
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

Was freshman year a fluke? Was the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year award attributable to a lucky season? Was the 13.6 points and 8.1 rebounds per game the season before an illusion? How could University of Massachusetts sophomore forward Octavia Thomas prove to everybody that she is for real?

31 points and 14 rebounds against defending national runner-up Ohio State with All-American Katie Smith trying to guard her, that's how.

"Six thousand people saw what she did," said Minutewoman Coach Joanie O'Brien. "Octavia went to the offensive boards and nobody could stop her. She ripped the ball out of people's hands, she chased the ball. I mean it was one-on-five and she got the ball and put it back on the basket.

"I can't teach what she does. Everything she does as far as offensive rebounding goes is just natural. It's special, I guess it's a gift. And she knows it and she takes advantage of what she can do."

It's Thomas's physical strength which sets her apart from her teammates and most opponents, O'Brien said.

"She's going to be tough for a lot of people to handle," O'Brien said. "She's so strong and she's so quick that if she puts her mind to it, she's going to be able to do what she did against Katie

Men's hoop wins again over hapless Bonnies

By John F. Bonafatti
ASSOCIATED PRESS

OLEAN, N.Y. — Dana Dingle and Mike Williams each scored seven points early in the second half as No. 9 Massachusetts pulled away from St. Bonaventure 86-66 Saturday night.

Dingle and Williams each hit a three-pointer and two field goals as the Minutemen took a 35-28 halftime lead and built it to 58-38 with 13:14 to play.

Williams led Massachusetts (5-1) with 18 points, while Donta Bright chipped in 16 and Louis Roe 15. St. Bonaventure (1-2) was led by senior Harry Moore, who had a career-high 32 points.

Roe's driving jump shot in the lane ended a seven-minute stretch early in the second half in which the Minutemen outscored the Bonnies 25-10 to take a 60-38 lead.

Massachusetts held that 22-point lead at several points early in the second half and St. Bonaventure got no closer than 15 points.

After Derek Kellogg hit three straight 3-point shots early in the first half, Edgar Padilla hit Massachusetts' fourth 3-pointer to give the Minutemen their biggest first-half lead at 20-8 with 10:41 left to go.

But eight Massachusetts turnovers and poor shot selection, along with the hard work of Moore, kept the Bonnies in the game. Moore scored 14 of his 17 first-half points in the half's final 10 minutes.

David Vanterpool's offensive rebound with 1:37 left in the half closed the Bonnies to within 30-28 before Massachusetts added the half's final five points.

Minuteman hockey splits in subpar weekend

By Michael Morrissey
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

The University of Massachusetts hockey team had a less-than-perfect weekend, losing its first game to a Division III opponent this season.

The Minutemen, who were 7-0 against Division III teams going into back-to-back games on Friday and Saturday, squeaked out a 4-3 overtime win against Bowdoin before losing to Colby, 5-3.

In sustaining their first loss to a non-Division I team, Massachusetts was ambushed by a Colby squad which had the luxury of resting on Friday night.

"I told the guys that next year we'll be playing back-to-back games every weekend and they have to get used to it," said Coach Joe Mallen. "The only difference is that the games will be against the same opponent so whatever fatigue factor there is will be the same on both sides."

Colby broke out of the gate at 1:02 in the first period when Brian Cronin scored on an assist by Dan Larkin to put the White Mules up 1-0. Blair Wagar tied things up two minutes later for Massachusetts and Rob Bonneau had an unassisted power play goal to put UMass up by a goal at 4:30.

The 2-1 edge was the last lead the Minutemen would hold, as Brian Pompeo, Todd McGovern, Darren Blauert and Jodey Eidt gave Colby four unanswered goals in the next two periods. Warren Norris scored on a power play to make it a respectable 5-3 final.

"I don't think they did anything special, anything different than what Bowdoin did," said Minuteman captain Jaynen Rissling. "They really wanted to take us to the limit on that given day. The rematch when they come to our barn is really going to be something special."

Friday's game was an exciting one that Mallen said his troops won't soon forget. UMass jumped out to a 3-0 lead before Bowdoin made things interesting in the final period.

"They battled back in the third period, and the tying goal went of one of our defenseman's sticks," Mallen said. "They were last year's champs in ECAC East and they're a lot more skilled than most Division III teams."

The game went to overtime before Armand Latullippe wristed a shot in the top left corner 24 seconds into the extra period. Latullippe had three points, including one other goal earlier in the game.

"Armand played really good," said Rissling. "And Dave Kilduff proved to be a very competitive when we needed him to be. He really stepped up and made some key saves."

Adding insult to injury, the Massachusetts team bus broke down on the long ride back from Maine Sunday morning. Waiting to get back to Amherst made some player's think more seriously about the Colby loss, Rissling said.

"The bus breaking down was something nobody forecasted, but I think it might be a positive," he said. "It made the loss burn in our brains a little more and I think some good might come out of it."

Men's gym starts season with a second in UMass Open

By David Gleeson
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team opened its season with a second place finish on Saturday at the UMass Open competition in the Curry Hicks Cage.

The Minutemen finished the meet in second place with 258.75 points, .6 points behind Temple who took first place at the meet with 259.35 points. Army came in third with 256.55, Southern Connecticut State finished fourth with 216.90 points, and M.I.T. rounded out the collegiate group in fifth with 174.75 points.

UMass Coach Roy Johnson expressed pleasure with the team's performance at the meet in this early season competition.

"It was a great opener," said Johnson. "It went right down to the wire."

UMass, Army and Temple exchanged top positions during the five rounds of competition, but Temple managed to overtake the Minutemen in the final round when they faltered on the pommel horse.

"If we had hit the pommel horse better, we could have pulled it out," said Johnson.

The Minutemen had good moments on the pommel horse, but could not pull off a complete routine that would bring in a high score.

In the all-around standings, Army's James Lewis took first place for his total score of 51.6 in the six events. The highest finish for UMass was Steve Goldman in fourth place with 50.1 points, followed by Ruslan Shupak in sixth with 50.0 points.

Shupak also took first place in the vault with a score of 9.55, and second on the still rings with a score of 9.35. UMass collected other event honors with Jason Braud taking second on floor exercise and parallel bars with scores of 9.45 and 9.2 respectively; Kiat Oboler took second on the high bar scoring 9.35.

In addition to the awards earned at the meet, the gymnastics program at UMass has been earning awards for its ability to balance academics. The men's squad was ranked seventh nationally in academics with a average cumulative GPA of 3.059; the women placed 20th nationally with an average of 3.060.

The UMass men's gymnastics team returns to competition January 7th at West Point.

Smith against everybody she plays against."

Thomas, a native of Newark, NJ, is one of four players brought in by O'Brien last year with great expectations. The quartet was brought to Massachusetts to help the Minutewomen raise themselves from the ashes and be a major player not only in the A-10, but also on the national level.

Last year, as freshmen, Thomas, Melissa Gurile, Kim Gregory and Tricia Hopson led the Minutewomen to an 11-15 record, including an impressive 6-8 in the A-10. Both are the highest marks Massachusetts has enjoyed since the 1988-89 campaign.

However successful you can call last season, Thomas insists the Minutewomen are just beginning to get back on track and she's not satisfied with having good seasons.

"We can go as far as we set our minds," Thomas said. "The only limitations we have are the ones we put on ourselves."

If you ask O'Brien, last year the only limitation Thomas had was her inability to develop a perimeter game — a limitation Thomas worked hard this summer to erase.

"Last year she didn't have much of a perimeter game," O'Brien said. "She wasn't going to step outside and hit the jump shot and she's added that part to her game, which has really made her a complete offensive player.

"Add in that 15-foot jump shot, now they can't just back off of her and let her shoot it because she's going to hit it."

"I really worked on my outside shot," Thomas said. "Last year, my main weakness was that I couldn't shoot from the outside, but now I feel comfortable out there."

Last year, Thomas started all 26 games for Massachusetts, registered 10 double-doubles during the regular season (including a streak in which she had four in a row), led the A-10 in field goal percentage at 52.1 percent and won the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week award four times.

In two games already this season, Thomas is averaging a double-double with her 20.5 points and 11.5 boards per game. Also, Thomas was named to the A-10 Preseason All-Conference Team as a result of her excellent freshman season.

"Octavia has brought her game up to another level," O'Brien said. "After coming off of last season, it probably would have been easy for her to rest on her laurels, but she didn't.

"She went out and added a little bit to her game and improved it. She wants to get better."

And that's no fluke.

■ Gurile

the off season to her improve her game. Playing in an NCAA-sanctioned summer league in Columbus, Ohio, featuring players from teams such as Ohio State and Toledo only helped Gurile's game.

Gurile also took part in an acceleration program, running sprints while on a treadmill. This program was aimed to improve quickness, strength and stamina. O'Brien said she has noticed a definite improvement.

"As for (Gurile's) strength, she has gotten so much stronger. She's going to be able to last the whole season. You're not going to be able to tell (how much strength she has gained) now. You're going to be able to tell in February," said O'Brien.

Aside from the added strength, the most helpful addition to Gurile's game is her outside shot she has improved. When Gurile is banged up inside, she can pop out for a 15-footer — with confidence.

"You can tell when you watch (Gurile) play that she has come a long way," said O'Brien. "She's now starting to feel good about shooting that 15-foot, 16-foot jump shot. Before, she thought she could shoot it, but she wasn't sure. Now she wants the ball."

A sign of good things to come.

Minutewomen picked to finish third in Atlantic 10 race

By Sean P. Hayden

After careful research and painstaking consideration, here is the Collegian's predicted order of finish for the women's basketball race in the Atlantic 10.

1. George Washington: The Colonials are talent-wise head and shoulders above the rest of the conference and should actually improve on its 11-3 conference record of a year ago.

Fifth-year coach Joe McKeown has perhaps the most talented duo in the league in juniors Debbie Hemery and Darlene Saar, both of whom were members of the East team in the U.S Olympic Festival this past summer.

Saar averaged 16.3 points and 11.2 rebounds per game last year and is the pre-season favorite for A-10 Player of the Year.

2. Rutgers: The Lady Knights are stung by the loss of backcourt starters Cheryl Cop and Vicky Green and forward C'ta Michelson, who won A-10 Tourney MVP honors after leading the Lady Knights to the championship.

Don't shed any tears for RU Coach Theresa Grentz, who returns a gem in Belgian import Caroline DeRoose, who led the Scarlet Knights with 15.7 points per game last year and received honorable mention All-America honors for her effort.

Supporting DeRoose will be frontcourt mate Janell Williams, a 6-foot-1 junior, who registered nine double-doubles last year, including two in both rounds of the NCAA Tournament in which RU appeared.

3. Massachusetts: See related story.

4. Rhode Island: The WRams received the nod at the fourth spot because they only lost one starter from last year's club that went 11-16, including its top four rebounders. So look for URI to try and pound the ball inside and make its hay off the offensive boards.

By the end of the season, the Minutewomen will have had all they can probably take of the Garnes family. Monica is a senior forward for the WRams who averaged 10.4 points and 8.0 rebounds per game last year and older sister Myra is cuurently an assistant at Ohio State, which recently defeated the Minutewomen by a 97-66 count.

5. St. Joseph's: The Hawks went 21-8 last season but figure to drop a couple of spots this year due to the loss of two first-team all-conference performers in the backcourt in Amy Mallon and Katie Curry. Curry was the conference Player of the Year last year and between she and Mallon, St. Joe's loses 35 points and 15 boards per game from a team that averaged 70 and 40 in those categories last year.

The return of frontcourt starters Audrey Codner, a preseason selection for all-conference, India Henderson and Val Johnson will help soften the blow for Coach Stephanie Gaitley, but as the season progresses, the hole in the backcourt will start to become eminent.

6. Temple: In a league dominated by frontcourt performers, the Owls are at a loss with no returning starters at the post positions so Coach Charlene Curtis should have a long year on the Temple bench.

After sitting out last season, diminutive point guard Ayana Winston returns to the point, and along with junior Chantel Adkins and sophomore Jennifer Linthicum, this position looks to be one of few bright spots on a young and untested Owl team.

7. West Virginia: If you're Mountaineer Coach Scott Harrelson, you know you're in for a miserable season when you return only one starter from a team that went 12-16 the previous year.

That lone returnee is sophomore guard Amanda Hayes, who averaged 7.6 points and 4.4 rebounds per game last year.

The future looks bright for WVU as Harrelson had a banner year recruiting, but he must try and keep his sanity this year in order to see that future unfold.

8. St. Bonaventure: The Bonnies return four starters from last year's 13-14 squad, but looks can be deceiving as they only went 2-12 in the A-10. The talent pool just isn't there in Olean in order for the Bonnies to be competitive. The addition of Duquesne is keeping them out of the cellar.

9. Duquesne: New Coach Dan Durkin has the unenviable task of trying the make the Lady Dukes competitive in their first year back after a one-season hiatus in the Midwestern Collegiate Conference.

Laws protect felons' rights

Admissions policy does not question criminal record

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

A convicted rapist not yet sentenced due to a pending appeal enrolled at the University of Massachusetts this semester.

Zaigham K. Khan, 23, was formerly a student at Gettysburg College in Pennsylvania. He transferred to the University and was accepted in April, according to the admissions office. Khan is listed in the registrar's office as a senior economics major. He lives off campus.

A jury convicted Khan May 13 of two counts of rape and five counts of indecent assault for events in March and August, 1992, according to court documents. Khan has not been sentenced and is out on bail.

Khan is appealing the convictions with a hearing date set for Dec. 30, according to Martha Duvall, assistant district attorney of Adams County, Pa.

Charges were filed in October 1992, according to the criminal complain reports.

Gettysburg College barred Khan from campus after the rape charges were brought against him, according to John McAndrew, director of public relations at Gettysburg College.

The University Admissions Office accepted Khan before he was convicted and did not know of the charges brought against him, according to director Arlene Cash.

"We wouldn't know," she said, "if at the time of his admission he was not convicted."

Khan voluntarily withdrew from Gettysburg College in November 1992, according to the Gettysburg College registrar's office. The University Admissions Office does not follow up on withdrawals because Cash said there are a variety of reasons for a student to withdraw.

"If a student requests a transcript sent to another school," she said, "it is just a common courtesy to call after a conviction. When Gettysburg College knew of Khan's conviction, they should have told us."

Both the campus police department and the Dean of Students Office said if after acceptance they found out a student was a convicted felon, they could not tell anyone. Both offices said they are bound by confidentiality.

Jo-Anne Vanin, dean of students, said to her knowledge it is not possible to remove a student after acceptance to the University based on criminal history.

Khan is basing part of his appeal on the consolidation of two cases into one trial and failure to admit the women's past sexual histories into the trial, according to the document submitted by his lawyer, Michael George.

Duvall said the cases of two women were consolidated into one trial because the circumstances were so similar.

Originally, four women charged Khan with rape, according to Duvall. He was convicted of rape and indecent assault in the consolidated trial. She said he was acquitted in another trial and the fourth woman dropped the charges before the trial began.

"Indecent assault," she said, "is touching private parts without the consent of the individual."

Both women in the consolidated trial told police that they passed out at separate parties at Khan's apartment and awoke to find him having sex with them.

The first woman said on March 27, 1992, she passed out after drinking alcohol and smoking marijuana at Khan's apartment, according to court documents. She said she awoke to find Khan having sex with her to which she did not consent, according to court documents. Khan was convicted on two counts of indecent assault and there was no verdict on the rape charge, according to court documents.

The second woman said on Aug. 27, 1992, she drank alcohol and passed out at a party in Khan's apartment. She told police in court documents that she awoke to find Khan having sex with her.

Court documents further said, "He had her pinned down and she could hardly move but attempted to fight him off but was unsuccessful and told him no several times. After Khan finished she attempted to get out of the bed and escape but he pushed her back down on the bed and refused to allow her to get up. He then forced her to have oral sex with him. He then again had sexual intercourse with her against her wishes."

Khan was convicted of two counts of rape and three counts of indecent assault on the second woman, according to court documents.

John McAndrew, director of public relations at Gettysburg College, said Khan was restricted from campus after the charges were brought against him.

"He was barred from campus given the extent of the charges," he said. "It was the safest alternative for Zaigham and other students."

The college wanted to avoid Khan coming into contact with the women, according to McAndrew. Khan was only allowed on campus for "essential business" and had to be escorted by a college official.

McAndrew said Khan came onto campus onto after his restrictions, to collect his belongings. He was removed from his apartment which was owned and

Porter gets 18-20 years for offenses

By KATHARINE WEBSTER
Associated Press

NEW BEDFORD — Former priest James Porter was sentenced to at least 18 years in prison for child molesting Monday after 22 of his victims spoke of the pain and embarrassment they quietly endured for three decades.

Before the sentence was announced, Porter tearfully begged for leniency, but one victim told the judge: "I would ask the court to show the same amount of mercy that Mr. Porter showed us, and that is none."

Prosecutors had urged that Porter be imprisoned for up to 40 years. The victims asked for sentences including life imprisonment, stoning and castration.

The former Roman Catholic priest pleaded guilty Oct. 5 to 27 charges of indecent assault and battery of a child under 14, as well as 14 related charges stemming from the period in the 1960s when he was at parishes in North Attleboro, Fall River and New Bedford.

Porter served six months in jail in Minnesota for molesting a baby sitter.

"What led me to do the things I did is still somewhere in me," he said. "Every time I look into the mirror, my mind makes me see the monster that I was. My conduct will stain my life until I die."

Porter had pleaded for treatment in a center near his wife and four children in Minnesota.

"I want you to know, James Porter, that you may have forgotten me and my face and my name, but I will never forget what you did to me," John Vigorito told the court.

Daniel Lyons told how Porter raped him, and "when I would scream, he would put his hand over my mouth so no one could hear. Today, I am heard."

Victims told of nightmares, depression, drug and alcohol addictions and at least four attempted suicides.

State legislators pass gay rights bill

BOSTON (AP) — The Massachusetts House and Senate on Monday enacted, without debate, a law that imposes a statewide ban on discrimination against gay students in public schools.

The bill, which proponents say would combat the harassment that leads some gay teen-agers to drop out or commit suicide, now heads for Gov. William Weld's desk.

"I think it's a victory for a group of young people who lobbied the bill, I think, very articulately and their compelling argument that this discrimination was real and not imagined and all kinds of discrimination should stop," said Sen. Robert Havern, D-Arlington.

The bill says no one shall be discriminated against in a public school or have his or her studies interfered with on account of sexual orientation.

Weld has supported the proposal, which activists say would be a first in the nation, if signed.

"No statute's going to change attitudes, but it's a first step in telling people that discrimination and intolerance are not good," said Havern.

Massachusetts in 1989 became the second state, after Wisconsin, to enact a gay rights law that banned discrimination against homosexuals in housing, credit and employment. But activists said it did not cover the school setting.

"This is an incredible victory for gay and lesbian students throughout Massachusetts," said David LaFontaine, political director of the Coalition for Lesbian and Gay Civil Rights.

"The safety of gay and lesbian students throughout America will be enhanced if other states follow Massachusetts' lead," he said.

"This is unnecessary legislation over a contrived

"As I look at the faces of my fellow survivors, I see the pain we suffered. There is no punishment imaginable that can erase our pain," said John Warburton.

The case against Porter, 58, had drawn national attention, and Superior Court Judge Robert Steadman said the former priest had become "an effigy representing all the other named and unnamed child abusers."

A Roman Catholic center in New Mexico that treated pedophile priests apologized to 25 alleged victims of Porter and announced in November it had settled their lawsuits for more than $8 million. The Servants of the Paraclete treatment center said it wasn't admitting responsibility for actions by Porter, who twice underwent treatment at the center in Jemez Springs, N.M.

Porter was sentenced Monday to concurrent prison terms of 18 to 20 years for four counts of sodomy, and concurrent 3-to 5-year sentences for 27 counts of indecent assault and battery against children under 14, and seven counts of indecent acts against children under 16.

Porter will be eligible for parole in six years.

Porter's sentence also stipulates that he serve 10 years' probation, during which he undergo treatment for pedophilia and stay away from children under 16, other than his own.

Porter's attorney, Peter DeGelleke, said Porter would petition to serve his sentence in a Minnesota jail, rather than the Massachusetts state prison.

"Certainly it is a long, harsh sentence," DeGelleke said.

"You have got a church that by 1963 had 30 to 40 reports of what this man has done, and they kept him in place, coming into contact with countless altar boys," he said.

VIBES throws holiday party for shelter kids

KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

Christmas was in the air inside the North Congregational Church community building in North Amherst yesterday as VIBES had its annual party for children from the Amherst Survival Shelter.

Volunteer Initiative Blending Education and Service is a community service program from the School of Management. Lead by Helen Plosky, Elisabeth Allen, Amy Sullivan and Melissa Piskosz, the group has been holding the Christmas party for the past five years.

This year the party, which was held in two sessions, included a storyteller, a magician and balloon sculptor, and about 100 happy children. The children also had the chance to see Santa Claus and receive presents after visiting him.

Starting off the party, storyteller Tim Van Egmond took the kids on a "bear hunt— a big bear hunt." He had the children mesmerized with his song while he brought them through mud, up a tree and through a river to find the big bear.

Ed Popielarczyk wowed the crowd, both young and old, with his balloon creations. This is his second year

Physical plant construction improves campus

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

To enhance the Campus Center landscape, the University of Massachusetts Physical Plant is currently undertaking a $1.1 million project to rebuild the steam trench starting near Goessmann Annex and running to the edge of North Pleasant St.

Architectural Project Coordinator of Physical Plant Niraj Dangoria said the project began as an effort to rebuild the concrete steam trench that delivers steam heat to various areas of campus. Because the project involved tearing apart the walkway near the Campus Center, Physical Plant officials saw the opportunity to improve the walkway.

"The walkway near the campus center is not an isolated area. It is the nucleus of pedestrian traffic, and it is an area that should be treated with respect," Dangoria said. "Since we had to tear up that walkway we began looking into what we could do to improve it when it was rebuilt."

Dangoria said Physical Plant hired a team of landscape architects to help them find ways to make the walkway area near the entrance of the Campus Center more pleasant.

"We want to create an area that reflected the importance of this part of campus," he said. "We felt the entrance to the Campus Center looked like a subway station, and we wanted to get away from that image."

"We want to create an area that reflected the importance of this part of campus. We felt the entrance to the Campus Center looked like a subway station, and we wanted to get away from that image."

– Niraj Dangoria

To accomplish this, the walkway was repaved, and the steps leading to the entrance of the Campus Center were removed to make the entrance easier for the handicapped. They also planted a row of Katsura trees outside of the entrance. Katsura trees were picked for their vibrant color in the fall, Dangoria said. He also said by the spring, 100 new trees will planted in the seven acre area from the Graduate Research Tower to the south side of Hasbrouck Lab.

Dangoria said another part of the project was to pave over the grass areas on campus where people walk the most and to create a pedestrian path free of vehicle transportation. He said this was being done because someone in a wheelchair was hit by a vehicle last year.

"We have sidewalks, but we realized there were cowpaths everywhere," he said. "We did research to see where people actually walk, and the new walkways follow the desire line of pedestrian movement."

Dangoria said Physical Plant will be finished with 90 percent of the reconstruction by the year's end. He said the projects that Physical Plant takes on in the future will be influenced by the success of this project and the public's reaction to it.

"If there is a lot of public support for this project, and people look at what we have done and say 'Wow, look at that— it looks good,' than we can expect to see more projects of this nature in the future," he said.

Play focuses on AIDS

Concert, play highlights GLB cafe series

By WENDY MATAYA
Collegian Corespondent

On Sunday, lesbian folk-singer Jaime Morton shared her music and Hampshire College student Collin Chace performed his one act play, an AIDS rage, If You Cough While in a Metal Box as part of the GLB cafe event series.

Morton took the stage first. Her songs ranged from love songs to a critique of American consumerism entitled "It's a Mall World."

Morton, who will begin a tour of the West Coast in February, has been a singing professionally for several years.

Her voice moved the audience in a way few other performers are capable of.

Chace wrote, directed and performed in If You Cough While in a Metal Box. The play is a composite of monologues focusing on the AIDS crisis.

A person dies of AIDS every seven minutes, according to current statistics. Chace reflected this in his monologue as a southern Black drag queen, who, as she watches seven minutes tick by on a clock, wonders if the person who has just died of AIDS is someone she knows.

The same character, who says she has worn her three inch heels down to sandals from marching at demonstrations for more AIDS funding, expresses the courage it takes to survive in a world that isn't always friendly, especially when you are Black, gay, transvestite or HIV positive.

One of the highlights of the play was an ironic "Red Ribbons" show tune.

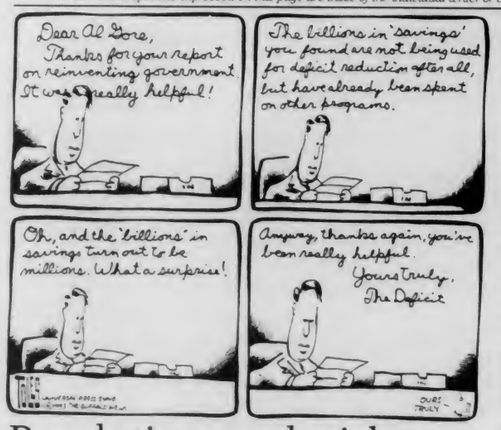
The song claims these red ribbons, often worn by musicians, politicians and actors to highlight the AIDS crisis, are often the total extent of the wearer's activism.

Chace sang it because it can be removed "when making company uncomfortable or if it clashes with an individuals outfit."

The red ribbon has become an empty symbol of the battle against AIDS.

The most jarring act was Chace's performance as an AIDS infected lab monkey. After 12 years of the AIDS epidemic, there is no cure and only three FDA approved drugs for people who are HIV positive.

The available drugs are extremely expensive and are not proven totally effective.



Chace's monkey is injected with a possible cure while a human looks on with envy.

World AIDS Day was celebrated last week. Many students protested government inaction and corporate greed surrounding the AIDS crisis, while others mourned their losses and received valuable information.

To this Chace asks, "After these AIDS awareness weeks are over, will anyone care?"

Resolutions and wishes

I don't advocate drinking alcohol. And I don't particularly enjoy the mornings after. But there are two days in your lifetime that you are expected to wake up with a hangover. One is the morning after your 21st birthday; hey, it's legal. It only happens once, so why not?

The other one, however, is the annual

Arthur

occasion when it is politically correct to stumble around in a daze and not truly feel guilty about the night before. Of course, I'm talking about New Year's Day.

Since I won't be anywhere near Amherst when the ball falls in the Big Apple, ushering in '94, I want to grace these pages with my resolutions/wishes for next year; keep in mind that they are coming early because memory and alcohol on the five just don't mesh.

• Next semester, I will go to a majority of my classes because I've learned that my name is very prominent, thus making it easier for the professors to detect my absence.

• I wish that rental car agencies could explain to me why if I'm able to do anything in this country legally, why I can't rent their car without getting charged an extra fee?

I guess this goes back to the same idea of how much different I am when I'm 21 from being 18. Whatever.

• I hope that the men's hoop team and Temple are ranked in the Top 10 come Feb. 13, when the Minutemen and the Owls meet in the Mullins Center on ABC.

• After spending almost 20 years as a sap, as well as a hopeless romantic, I hope to go a day without listening to either Billy Joel, Chicago or Lionel Richie.

• In my Christmas stocking, I want Skoal instead of coal.

• I hope that the University will offer a PE course for Sega. A lot of people would finally get credit for something that takes up more time than classes, causes more hand cramps than typing papers and brings about more stress than grades.

• Because I am living in the dorms for another semester, I want Housing to realize that the heat need not be turned on when it is 55 degrees outside — at 7 a.m. There is nothing worse than waking up and having to peel off my shirt from a night of sweating.

Well, except if it's on the weekend, and you're not alone. But that's another wish entirely.

• I wish we all lived in the '50s again and hang-outs like Arnold's were still around. Seeing Fonzie jump barrels on a motorcycle, then crash into Arnold's chicken stand is one of my favorites. I can see my roommate doing something that stupid.

• I want cases and cases of Diet Coke — I've become addicted to the stuff. Honestly, opinions can change, and I've reconsidered. Now I know why people eat a feast and then quench their thirst with this beverage.

• I will not drink an alcoholic beverage from the day I leave Amherst until Feb. 17, my 21st birthday because I don't want to break the law anymore.

• I wish I could stop this constant fibbing.

• After spending almost 20 years as a sap, as well as a hopeless romantic, I

Peter Pan's monopoly must end

Last week the president of Peter Pan Bus Lines was among the panel that met with students to discuss that company's fare increases. His explanation wasn't exactly a lie, but wasn't the whole truth either.

The Pioneer Valley Transit Authority, he claimed, sets the prices for tickets. What he did not mention, however, is that the PVTA does not initiate face increases. According to the PVTA, as bus company must submit all proposed fare increases to the regional transit authority for approval. The transit authority, acting as a regulatory agency, has the power to either approve or deny the company's request. Thus the PVTA never told Peter Pan that a round-trip ticket to Boston must cost $29.95, but they did give the company permission to raise the price to that amount.

Therefore, one could say that the PVTA set the price, without mentioning that Peter Pan had initiated the increase, and still remain vaguely within the realm of truth.

The president's ethics were slippery, but Peter Pan is in business to make a profit and ethics and profits don't always mix. The only way to fight unfair fare increases is not buy the tickets. Students must hit Peter Pan where it counts this holiday season: right in the profit margin. Since Peter Pan has no Amherst to Boston competitors, students with and without cars must car pool in to meet this end.

I urge my fellow students and community members to boycott the protested Peter Pan Boston route until the company is willing to play fair.

Congrats are in order...

Being the end of the semester, a headcheck is in order. The biannual Bite-Me/Get a Clue awards go to those who need a clue, and those who proved I need a clue.

These people can bite me...

•David Scott - Honestly guy, get a clue. It is administration like you which corrupts a system. Going over the heads of others to hire your friends, creating positions, and doing this during a hiring freeze? You can definitely bite me.

Adam
GOULSTON

•Dining Commons - Now I don't hold the lunch ladies personally responsible for anything but occasional rudeness. Those that can bite me are the administrators who dish up the same dismal crap everyday and force us to pay for it. I see students who eat nothing but salad and cereal, because the food is cold and vile. Others, I know have ordered calzones or gone out to McDonald's everyday for dinner for the same reasons. And, nothing's changing...no heat, same menu selections as last year.

•Violent drunks - Now, I don't know if it's coincidence that as some drink, their accents become worse in direct proportion to the number of people they think are starting with them. "Yaaaa doooood, I'll kick your aaaassss!" You guys can bite me. Drinking is about having a good time and relieving academic stress. I don't need some jerk thinking I'm shooting him dirty looks when I'm trying to have fun.

•Losers at concerts - They range from the guys in the ripped-off muscle shirts, to the jocks in the pit throwing punches, to those who have never seen the deodorant aisle in CVS. You are not on stage, the band is. Get a clue.

•Barney - I'm not mad because Barney's yanked right out of '50s cheese-ball, glossed-over, white-bread society. I'm mad because this type of absurdity is being pushed on our next generation. I love you! You love me! I love you even more, because I'm getting rich off you!

These folks I'd gladly bite, they made the world a better place...

•SETA - These kids sponsored the Campus Pond cleanup. Dredging that mess was a truly selfless and humanistic act. The ducks are happier, no more smell. You folks are great. I'd like to bite each and every one of you. Now maybe you can start in on the Campus Center stalls.

•The Hasbrouck Project - I ranked on these guys for putting airstrips outside the Campus Center. I must confess. It's looking nicer. But dude, what's up with the pitching mounds?

•Jim's Journal - Despite the criticism, Jim hasn't altered his life one bit. He doesn't want to be worshipped but sometimes it's hard not to. He's doing okay.

•Albey Reiner - Reiner's "Biology of AIDS & Cancer" course is the most popular on campus and UMass' most mellow professor finally got his teaching award this year. Turn down the lights, and say a moment of thanks.

•Anti-Minuteman activists - They were fighting a lost cause about an inane topic, but they had the nerve to fight for something which is more than most can say.

•Antonio's - Peace through pizza. Tortellini, who'da thunk?

•Brew masters and ganja cultivators - Their products are social lubricants which some frown upon while others swear by them. Yet without beer and weed, nothing would differentiate UMass from the Coast Guard Academy.

I bite you! You bite me!

Adam Goulston is a Collegian columnist.

It's all how you look at it

I feel bad for UMass. The poor campus is constantly being ripped apart, banned, censored and criticized. Whether it is how ugly the buildings are on campus, or how the mascot should be changed, UMass is always dealing with students' problems and complaints.

So many students on this campus are uptight about the smallest things. Instead of appreciating what they have here at UMass, people repeatedly abuse it.

Geri
SAHN

So I have decided to write an editorial on the positive things about UMass. You would be surprised to find out that overall we are pretty lucky to be here.

Let's first start with the Student Union and the Campus Center. These two connecting buildings have everything. Food, friends, book stores, penny candy, bank machines, campus phones and couches. What more could you possibly ask for? Everything you need, all put together in one building. Passing through the hallways, signs for upcoming events are posted everywhere. The Hatch serves stir fry and is a place where you can have a beer before going to your 1:25 class. The Student Union also has a post office, ticket booth, bicycle shop and The People's Market. The Campus Center has our very own campus hotel.

Another great thing about the UMass campus is the pond, which is right in the center of everything. Not only does it add to the beautiful New England-college look of our campus, but it is the home of our very own UMass ducks and our one and only swan. Sure, some of the buildings on campus don't match, but it adds character. It is somewhat of an analogy to the people who go here. Diversity is on the inside and on the outside.

Another nice thing about UMass is the five different living areas on campus. Each is so different from the other. Because of the diversity represented throughout the residence halls, a person is bound to be comfortable somewhere. And who can argue about the size of the rooms? They are mansions compared to the rooms at many other universities.

The Munchy stores. What a convenient thing to have both on campus and in our living areas. You can pick up necessary things without leaving campus. Best of all, the prices aren't jacked up to rip students off. I recently compared prices on several items from the CVS in town, to the Munchy stores in the Student Union. Fig Newtons at CVS were $1.15, while at the Munchy store they were $1. That is a big difference.

Many students complain about how they feel like a number at this school. "Hi my name is 194-39-3391." But when you think about the advantages of being a number, you'll realize that you are being saved from dealing with many hassles. I know in some schools, in order to sign up for classes you have to stand in line and fight in order to get into the ones you want. I love the convenience of picking up the phone and choosing my classes, choosing my room and finding out how much my phone bill is, all in a matter of five minutes.

I'm from New Jersey, so I feel that being an out-of-state student attending this University gives me a different view of UMass than in-state students. UMass is an extremely well-respected University. It has an excellent reputation both socially and academically. I am tired of hearing UMass sucks. If you don't like it, transfer.

UMass has everything. I truly believe that a person can find a home here. It is all a matter of searching.

Muslim students combat stereotype images

By BARBARA A. CANNISTRARO
Collegian Staff

"The Muslims Are Coming! The Muslims Are Coming!"

Titles and headlines, such as this one in the "National Review" a couple years back, imply something about Muslims — they are a threat.

And, who is this threat directed at? "At us."

What people don't realize is that Muslims outnumber Episcopalians in this country, and that a good portion of "us" is made up of "them."

Despite the media barrage of images stereotyping Arabs and Muslims as stone-throwing children and gun-wielding adults, there are Muslim students here on campus who stand testament to the diversity and compatable nature of their faith.

Sabuur Abdul-Kareem, president of the graduate chapter of the Muslim Students Association, said that MSA represents approximately 1,000 Muslim students, faculty and staff in the Amherst area.

MSA, a national organization founded in 1963, serves a dual purpose.

According to Abdul-Kareem, MSA provides "spiritual, academic, and social support" for Muslims on campus, as well as providing information about Islam to anyone wanting to broaden their understanding of the religion.

As a student-run organization, working together with similar organizations at the Smith, Hampshire, Mount Holyoke and Amherst College campuses, Abdul-Kareem said that MSA often joins with other student and local groups to sponsor programs addressing social and world issues.

This semester MSA sponsored informative movies about Islam, and on Nov. 16 organized an event that packed the Student Union Ballroom, Warith Dean Muhammad's discussion on race relations in America, "An Islamic Perspective."

Last semester, MSA actively participated in a donation program for the Amherst Food Shelter and sponsored lectures dealing with current events in Bosnia and Somalia.

According to Abdul-Kareem, MSA focuses on "problems with Muslims and all members of the human family," and its "students should reach out to the community through charitable acts."

MSA's undergraduate vice president, Abdul Kanaan, has placed outreaching to "all other clubs, organizations and religions," as one of his goals for the organization.

Kanaan, born and raised in Beirut, Lebanon, explained that his experience with Americans since coming to the United States has been one of "prejudgement."

Frequently, people who meet him are surprised when they learn that he is a Muslim.

When people think of an Arab, Kanaan said, they picture "someone on a camel in the desert with a sword."

A computer engineering major, Kanaan has become more active in his religion since coming to the United Sates.

He explains this is because most people in this country have misperceptions about Islam, and he wants to be active in changing that.

Maha Kazi, a junior biology major and a former public relations officer for MSA, shared Kanaan's feelings about the lack of understanding among Americans.

In regard to Islam and Muslims, Kazi explained that it seems, "the average person is not just unaware, but has absolutely no desire to know" about Islam.

In the past Kazi, a Pakistani from the United Arab Emirates, has had to explain to non-Muslim roommates that her beliefs are not overly strict, and Muslims are not narrow-minded. To Kazi, such perceptions are "totally not true."

Fortunately, Kazi and her roommates have become friends after getting to know one another, but according to Abdul-Kareem, this is not always the case.

Sometimes, he explains, "cultural misunderstandings" necessitate that Muslim students move from their rooms. MSA officers advise these students and interface with the University in such instances.

Along with the support MSA provides to Muslim students experiencing overt discrimination, MSA provides consistent moral support for its students through organized prayer sessions (jumaa' salat) on Friday afternoons at 12:30 in the Campus Center.

Because they do not have a designated prayer-space at the University, people interested in attending jumaa salat should go to the Campus Center information desk for the weekly room number.

Abdul-Kareem said that during the holy month of Ramadan, which falls between Feb. 11 and March 13 next year, MSA will once again encourage Muslim students to observe the daily fast.

He said that MSA will represent observant students on the meal plan to food services and their professors in order to ensure that they are able to get meals during the break-fast night hours.

Because MSA promotes understanding, all of its services and programs are open to everybody, Muslim and non-Muslim, male and female alike.

In accordance with their holy book, the Qur'an (S. 30:22), MSA is open to students of every race and nationality.

For more information about MSA or Islam, contact Sabuur Abdul-Kareem at 546-4523, or Abdul Kanaan at 546-7279.

Celebrate Christmas for Haiti

By MOISE TIRADO
Collegian Staff

Before you leave for Christmas, I feel compel to remind you about the Haitian people and their struggle for justice, dignity, freedom and their hope to find the spirit of christmas.

It has been two years and three months, since the military stole the spirit of Christmas from the Haitian people. It was to be their first free Christmas, and everyone was getting ready for it.

"This will be my third Christmas out of my country. I never thought I would spend three cold Christmases here."

–Moise Tirado

Every household brought paint and decorations to fix their houses. New clothes were being made for midnight Mass. Homemade liquors had been prepared since July, and the goats and cows were being fatten up for festivities.

Haitians throughout the world were buying plane tickets. We were all going to go back home to celebrate our first free Christmas.

Thirty members of my family from the United States, France, Canada and Rome were to meet in Haiti two days before Christmas. By August, we had all reserved plane tickets and had started buying gifts for family and friends back home.

At 11:30 p.m. on Sept. 30, 1991, I received a phone call. It was Tony close to tears.

"Mo, there has been a coup in Haiti. So far 300 people have been killed."

My heart stopped. For a while, I stood there, petrified, shaking. "A coup! A coup!" I said. We called one another thoughout the night to talk about our Christmas plans, our hope and frustrations.

Those of us who didn't cry just kept repeating, "I don't believe it! Oh my God! Why? Why?"

This will be my third Christmas out of my country. I never thought I would spend three cold Christmases here.

I miss the cool ocean breeze on Christmas, the street vendors, the popular park of "Champs-de-mars" where all the youths would go and raise hell, where the lovers, exchanging kisses every once in a while, would walk holding hands on their way to midnight Mass. I miss my warm Christmas.

Since '91, Haitians in Haiti have not celebrated Christmas for fear the army might use it as an excuse to arrest or shoot them. I also had decided not to celebrate and have not done so for two years. This time, however, I will celebrate Christmas. I will give gifts, throw a party, go to Mass and pray. I have been fortunate enough to be alive and see one more Christmas.

I will celebrate for my cousin who has been killed, for the women and children who have died, for those who have been murdered and for the rape victims. I will celebrate this year for those who will be tortured and killed on Christmas. i have decided to celebrate life. The lives lost and ruined in the struggle for freedom. My freedom.

I ask you this year to remember them with me. To help me celebrate. When you raise your glass ready to toast on Christmas eve, toast to liberty, freedom and life.

Toast to and for my fellow countrymen and women in Haiti who will not be able to toast for themselves. Toast that their death may be avenged. HELP ME TOAST TO LIFE, HAPPINESS AND THE RETURN OF THE SPIRIT OF CHRISTMAS TO MY PEOPLE.

A Tanzanian City Experience

By MOHAMED LADHA
Special to the Collegian

It is six o'clock in the morning. The pilot announces that we are approaching Dar Es Aalaam International Airport. The name of the city means heaven of peace in Arabic. Started as a coastal fishing village, the city became a British colonial headquarters after the Germans left this part of East Africa in 1918.

As you approach the city center, it is an interesting view. The city is jammed with cars from all corners, everyone hooting at everyone else. Believe, it is real fun. More interesting is the racial diversity of the area. At one corner you observe an Swahili woman wrapped in "buibui" (black veil) carrying a basket full of vegetables while at the corner a South Asian woman in her traditional "sari" rushing her kid to school. At the same time, you pass across a street with an old Arab man sitting next to a traditional middle eastern coffee maker and selling coffee in small cups.

The city structure is interesting. Surprisingly, you learn that the shops are owned and managed by South Asians. These South Asians, most of them came to the then Tanganyka in late 1800s as merchants and in early 1900s as railroad workers. As you walk towards the suburbs, the profile of the people changes. In one area called Kariakoo, the place is dominated by Arab merchants. The place has a middle eastern cult to it but not exactly. You frequently hear a Muazzin calling people for prayers into the mosque. Women in veils and men wearing long gown called "Kanzu" with a cap. One of the suburbs is African Manzese. The houses have aluminum sheets on them and unpainted walls. A woman wearing "Khanga" is sitting next to a frying pan selling vitumbua. On the other side you observe the market place.

The city of diverse cultures does offer a lot for entertainment but the economic differences become very distinct as you move from one neighborhood to another. It is questionable whether such diverse differences in culture and economy can survive in harmony. The city has had a diverse influence from all the continents since the 10th century. It is a center of Swahili language but let us see how the westernization of the city will shape and change the current norms. Yes, I am anxious to see the changes myself.

operated by the college, according to McAndrew.

Khan was released on bail following his lawyer's motion for a new trial, but Duvall said she was not sure of the terms.

"I believe he was supposed to report to a parole officer in Massachusetts," she said.

The probation offices of Adams County District Court in Pennsylvania and Hampshire County Court said they could not release any information about Khan's bail or his probation status because it is confidential.

An article on July 20th Evening Sun Reporter in Hanover, Pa., said Khan was accepted at the University of Massachusetts, according to his lawyer.

Duvall said she and the arresting officer, Kevin Wilson of the Gettysburg Police Department, discussed calling UMass after they learned Khan was accepted.

Wilson said he did not call UMass because someone at the University called him after Khan's conviction. He said he did not remember to whom he spoke, but said the call was in regard to Khan.

To his knowledge, Wilson said UMass was already aware of Khan's conviction when the University contacted him.

Police Chief Jack Luippold of the UMass police department said Massachusetts law restricts police officers from discussing criminals' records with anyone other than police officers.

The Massachusetts Criminal Offender Record Information Act (CORI), "protects the confidentiality of an individual involved in the criminal justice system," he said.

Even if the police department was aware of a convicted felon was a student at UMass, they could not discuss that individual with anyone, including the administration, according to Luippold.

Tom Robinson, vice chancellor of student affairs, oversees the police department. He said he was unaware of a convicted rapist on campus, but sees the need for change.

"Raising this issue is important," he said. "If we've got the possibility for cracks people can fall through, then we need to look at the application process and take the appropriate steps. I intend to pursue this."

The University application does not ask about criminal history. For transfer students, there is a question. "Have you ever been on probation, suspended, or refused readmission to another other college or university?"

If the answer is yes, the student must have an official from the previous school write a statement explaining the circumstances, according to Kathy Ryan, director of transfer affairs.

Jo-Anne Vanin, dean of students, said she cannot discuss individual student cases and could not reveal if she was aware of a convicted rapist on campus because of her responsibility to protect confidentiality.

Vanin said she does not know of any way to remove a student if once he or she is accepted the University discovers the individual is a convicted felon.

"I think what we need to look at here," she said, "is what are the standards and what action should we take.

Confidentiality is important she said. Other schools cannot contact the University if they are aware of a student is convicted of a felony. Gettysburg College could have called the University to suggest it look at the public records of Khan, but it has to keep his records at the college confidential, she said.

"When and if the Dean of Students Office is made aware of an undergraduate admitted to the University with a conviction," she said, "it is not unusual to contact the individual and have an informal meeting."

In this meeting, Vanin said she would make the student aware of what types of conduct are expected by the University.

Vanin said it is possible she may recommend certain restrictions if she is aware a student has a criminal history, such as not allowing the student to live in the dorms.

"There is no policy," she said," but something like housing is a privilege. We are not denying the student's rights to an education."

Vanin said it will be important to look at what the admissions application asks incoming transfer students. She suggested a possible rewording of the application question regarding transfer student's standing at the previous school.

"This problem gives me a perspective," said Arlene Cash, director of admissions, "of future redesigns of the application."

Cash said she has worked with admissions for over 15 years at a number of schools. She said a possible addition to the application would be to adopt a question other schools ask. A dean must submit a letter for transfer students stating whether the student was leaving the school in "good standings or ill feeling."

University officials expressed a need for changes in the admission policies. Vanin also said there is a movement by the governor to change the CORI law.

Khan declined comment because of his appeal, but said his lawyer would give The Collegian a statement on his behalf. Khan's lawyer failed to comment and could not be contacted.

To all students concerned about the fate of an important student art gallery...

At this time the Student Union Art Gallery (SUAG), is unable to confirm the booking of shows for the fall of '94 and Spring of '95 due to uncertain funding in the future. We will at this time put you on a holding list.

The Board of Governors who allocates the SUAG's payroll budget from funds of the Student Activity Trust Fund has decreased it's funding of the Gallery over the past few years. We lost funding this year for our Graduate intern position for Publicity Director and did not actually receive a budget for this year from BOG until mid September. The Graduate Student Senate, which funds a much smaller portion of the SUAG also has been decreasing it's allocation. The Arts Council funds the operating budget for SUAG.

It is extremely important that your voice as students be heard if you think the funding of SUAG is important. You should make your concerns known to the BOG on the 8th floor of the campus center, the Graduate Student Senate on the 9th floor of the campus center and the Student Government Association located directly above the SUAG. The SGA oversees the entire Student Activity Trust Find which all undergraduate students pay fees to. Graduate students pay fees to the GSS.

The future of the SUAG is threatened, and it will be closed at the end of this spring if it does not receive payroll funds to operate for our next year.

Holiday Shopping and Fashion Guide

Local shopping offers wide holiday selection

By AMY S. BURNS
Collegian Correspondent

With Hanukkah falling before intersession and Christmas just a few days after finals are over, many people won't be able to wait until they get home to shop for presents this year. Even if you don't celebrate either of these holidays, you probably know someone who would appreciate a small gift to brighten up their winter.

Amherst can get pretty gloomy as the Winter Solstice approaches, so candles make great gifts. They come in all different colors and designs, and they're great for making your room more cheery while you're studying late into the night.

Amherst

Downtown Amherst is pretty convenient if you don't have a car, as the South Amherst and Belchertown Road buses run frequently on weekdays and every hour on weekends. If you're tired of always being on campus, shopping in Amherst is a nice change of scenery. The Mercantile has lots of candles to light up someone's winter evenings. If you're looking to open up someone's mind by giving them a book, Amherst has many great bookstores. Atticus—Albion sells reasonably priced used books, while Food For Thought Books has lots of books on multicultural and social issues. A bonus to shopping in Amherst is all the cafes where you can take shelter from the cold with a cup of coffee between shops. Bonducci's sells their coffee by the pound, a great gift for java fanatics.

Northampton

Like Amherst, Northampton has lots of bookstores and cafes, but it offers more shops and a greater selection, especially when it comes to clothes and jewelry. Northampton's main drawback is that it's farther away. The bus (Five College Route 2) takes 35 minutes and is often crowded. Northampton's unique shops are well worth it, if you can get there. Most shops are located on Main Street, as is Thorne's Market, which offers indoor shopping, but is not your typical mall.

COLLEGIAN/ARAM COMJEAN
The Mercantile is located in downtown Amherst.

Hampshire Mall

If you prefer shopping in a mall, the Hampshire Mall is the most convenient. It only takes 15 minutes by bus (Five College Route 2), but again this route can be crowded at times. The Hampshire Mall doesn't have a lot of the popular chains, but does have a K-Mart and an All For A Dollar for those bargain shoppers out there. There's also a J. C. Penny. Even if it's not too unique, the Hampshire Mall has all the basic types of stores. It offers an adequate selection, as well as the convenience of indoor shopping.

Holyoke Mall

Much larger than the Hampshire Mall, the Holyoke Mall offers more well—known stores. However it's pretty far away, and you're out of luck if you don't have a car or a friend with one, since this mall is not on the bus route.

The Campus Center

If you're really lazy or just have too much work to do as the semester draws to a close, the Campus Center wins hands down as the most convenient place to shop. Though it may seem like the easy way out, it actually has quite a bit to offer shoppers.

The main concourse hosts an array of mostly handmade goods, such as candles, jewelry and wool sweaters. Not far away, in the Student Union, People's Market has a variety of earthly delights, like herbal teas for cold winter nights and natural lotions for chapped skin. The University Store has a huge selection of cards, calendars and books. It has everything from soap dishes to boxer shorts, all with the University of Massachusetts logo. Any item emblazoned with these words makes a gift that's sure to please, especially for those paying for your college education.

Romance reigns over the latest winter fashions

By TARA MK CONNELLY
Collegian Staff

Winter is fast approaching with it's biting wind and swirling snow, yet despite the dreary weather, the word in winter clothing seems to be romance. Inspired by movies like The Age of Innocence, this year's winter collection has taken a trip back to the age when England was an empire and everything was Victorian.

Romantic velvet is one of the ways to capture this timeless look. It can be seen in everything from crushed velvet feathered hats to dresses and jeans.

Brocade is no longer for curtains and sofas. Designers used this heavily embroidered fabric to create vests, jackets and trim sleeves. Empire waisted dresses have been spotted along the runways in varying lengths, fabrics and colors sure to flatter any shape.

Lace is also a crucial element in creating the perfect Victorian ensemble. Ecra, French knit and English lace can be seen dripping from collars, cuffs and pockets.

Ralph Lauren used the romantic aura of the past in his Russia Collection. Composed of Slavic — inspired designs, his clothes bring back the nostalgic romance of Czars, winter palaces and sleigh rides.

The Christmas present that made dreams come

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

Christmas shopping was easy for my parents last year. They finally consented to my 15 years of begging and bought the only thing they knew would make last year's Christmas the most memorable and enjoyable of my life. They bought me a bulldog.

It all started for me when I was six years old, my infatuation and fascination with bulldogs. Bulldogs? What kind of warped six-year-old kid is fascinated with bulldogs? I'll tell you what kind of kid. The kind of kid who used to travel great distances with his grandfather each weekend to dog shows and who, one weekend, fell asleep behind the curtains with a stray bulldog curled up around him and, more than anything else, has wanted a bulldog ever since. That's what kind of kid.

"What kind of warped six-year old kid is fascinated with bulldogs?"
-Sean P.Hayden

I came home from UMass last December weary and down-trodden because of the toll that finals took on me. When I opened the door of my house and looked on the couch, I saw this tan, wrinkled, 60 pound piece of fat staring up at me, and it took me half a second to realize that this would be the best Christmas ever.

I got my bulldog — his name is Roscoe.

Everyone who knows me knows Roscoe, probably more so than they know my family. And everyone who knows me inevitably comes to believe that Roscoe is cooler than his geeky owner.

Everyone, except Roscoe.

I knew he was mine the first time I saw him. The funny thing is, I think he knew he was mine and that I was his.

When I'm home, he never leaves my side, and I never leave his. Anytime I go downstairs, Roscoe goes down. When I go back up, Roscoe goes back up. When I put on my coat, he runs to the door and then sits outside the passenger door of my car, waiting to see where our next trip will take us.

Dogs truly are man's best friends. That may sound sexist, demented and/or ignorant, but I don't care. People think I'm weird for caring for my dog the way I do, but in this world you have to care for something.

He needs me, and I need him. Who wipes his face after he eats because he gets so much of his food caught up in his wrinkled snout? I do.

Who wants to be by my side no matter what's happening and no matter how bad of a mood I'm in? He does.

Who scratches his butt when he itches and also because he can't reach it because he's so fat? I do.

Who keeps a can of air freshener on his bedstand to combat Roscoe's nightly attack of flatulence? I do. Who never complains about it? I don't.

Who was the greatest gift I've ever received at Christmas and who made last Christmas the best one ever for me? He did.

Sports & fashion mesh as hats, jackets prevail

COLLEGIAN/MATT KAHN
Baseball hats are all the rage, like this one, a beauty from the Kansas City Chiefs.

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

Like the Beastie Boys belt out on Licensed to Ill, it's "The New Style" — baseball caps, football jerseys and Starter jackets; ya know, all the things sports guys like me have been wearing since the fifth grade. But I just don't get it — I'm not meant to have style.

I never thought I had keen fashion sense, nor did I think I needed it. My idea of dressing up in high school was wearing shoes. Four out of five days of the week I would wear sports T-shirts, sweatpants and my Dallas Cowboys jacket.

My sister, who is three years younger than me and, according to her, "much more cooler," always called me a geek and a sports nerd because I wore baseball caps with "stupid teams on them." I was never going to be cool.

Well times have changed — everything except for the cool part. If you haven't noticed by now, sports merchandise overwhelms college campuses and the students who inhabit them. What was once sloppy, dress-down clothes has become the "In" thing. People who don't know the first thing about sports now run to the stores to find the latest fashion trends.

Fitted, adjustable, pump-hats and ones that tighten with strings— they all make a statement.

Telling the difference between the Oakland A's, the California Angels or the Atlanta Braves doesn't matter. As long as the colors match the outfits, the price is right, the style is original and the logo is appropriate, the hat is purchased.

After the cap is yours, the mix-and-match continues with what to wear. During the winter, especially around this time of year, a jacket is a must. Not just any jacket, though. Whether it's a windbreaker, a pullover, or a parka does not matter; most of the time it is the team and its colors that count. When Michael Jordan was around, the Bulls were it.

The importance of shoes is a life lesson

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

When the idea of a holiday fashion and shopping issue came about, I laughed at the thought of being responsible to accurately and tastefully present clothing and style trends. "Me," I thought. "I am the least fashion-conscious person I know." Once we start talking outside of the realm of jeans, I am pretty lost. I was hopeful that my trusty staff would have some clues and insight on this matter.

For the next few weeks I pondered the situation and realized a truth that my father had told me long ago about shoes. Shoes?

Ever since I can remember, my dad has taken my brother and I shoe shopping. I always got such a kick out of that fangled foot measure, especially if the clerk tried to tickle my feet while measuring. My dad, however, was another story.

Any hope of leaving the shoe store under two hours was always demolished as soon as my father started poking my shiny, shoe-clad foot with his thumb.

"Where's your toe," he would ask. "Is that it? If that's it they're too small. You have wide feet, like your mother, so don't tell me they feel fine if they are too narrow," he would yell, as a small crowd of shoppers would gather around our little bench.

"Go and walk over there, and tell me if they pinch." Bright red and totally humiliated, I would slump around the store to appease him.

My poor brother and I would take turns while dad did his thing, the sympathetic clerk trying desperately to find the perfect shoe. He would search through every, single box of every model in my size. High-tops, low-tops, flats, sandals and boots. The boots were the worst.

"There, nothing will get through these babies," he would marvel, holding up the tallest, most thickly insulated, rubber specimens. "I think we found 'em."

Indeed, the boots he usually selected were secure enough to wear on just about any military excursion, given I could lift my heavy feet.

As I got older, something about the way in which I regarded footwear changed. I think it was after one day that my father sat me down and explained the importance of comfortable, durable shoes.

"The thing you have to remember is that no matter what, as long as you have good, solid shoes on, you're OK," he told me. He explained that even insufficient sweaters on cold days, missing raincoats and skimpy gloves were not nearly as traumatic if your feet were comfortable.

Dad's advice must have somehow sunk in, admittedly after more than one episode of falling down in "pretty" shoes that defied every footwear rule that he had ever told me.

I have since adapted a sort of fetish with shoes that I can only attribute to my father. My collection is comprised mainly of boots. My favorites are a pair of brown leather and fuzzy wool insulation that I bought in Florence, Italy.

In addition, I have a pair of Timberlands, the meanest, most sturdy pair of boots that anyone could imagine, and one that every college student should own.

I still go shoe shopping with my father, and thanks to him winters full of ice, slush, snow and other such obstacles, no longer pose as great a threat to me, despite my lack of grace and tendency to fall down. The shoes I own not only serve me well now, but have lasted for many rainstorms and snowfalls.

COLLEGIAN/ARAM COMIEAN
No wardrobe or life is complete without a pair of boots.

Something else about what dad said to me that day about the importance of good shoes has proved true since then. There is something comforting in putting on a pair of favorite shoes quite incomparable to anything else.

No matter how many outfits you try on and hate, or how, some mornings nothing fits right or everything is in the laundry basket or on the floor, shoes are rather constant and can always make you feel better.

Not a bad thing, in light of my father's other assertion that, shoes in place, it's important to keep those feet securely on the ground.

Actually, people still wear Bulls' stuff. Obviously, another example of not knowing anything about sports.

The Chicago White Sox are hot sellers, thanks to their 1991 decision that changed team colors from a hideous mix of blue and red to basic black and white. Sox hats, which used to be very scarce, are now everywhere.

When you finally decide on a hat and a jacket, the job isn't finished. Everyone has a different way to wear it, I guess suiting his or her own persona. Some like to pull it all the way down, possibly attempting to hide their eyes; others prefer to seemingly wear it on their neck, showing as much hair as they can.

But the most important thing about wearing these lids is the brim and how broken in it is. Like the Starter commercial with the Fresh Prince said a few years back, you have to bend the hat. Never wear a hat with a flat brim.

So now when I go home and talk to my sister on some Friday night, and she's ready for a night out partying with those high schoolers, she asks if she can borrow my clothes.

I guess it's cool to be a sports geek.

UNDERGRADUATE COMMENCEMENT
Bachelor's Degree Candidates
Preliminary Information

Undergraduate Commencement 1994 will be held Sunday, May 22, at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium, 10:30am to 11:45am. The ceremony will take place there rain or shine.

Seniors whose degree requirements will be completed in February, May, or September 1994 are eligible to participate. If you are unsure of your academic status or have questions in this regard, please immediately contact a member of the "Senior Staff", Records Office, 207 Whitmore, 5-0555.

An informational brochure about Commencement and related matters will be mailed to prospective graduates and parents between mid-February and early March. Details about the ceremony itself will be contained in a mailing to graduates in early May. Similar information will also be in the last issue of the "Collegian" in the Spring.

The first mailing will include information about:

Announcement packets	Housing (on-campus)
Caps, gowns, tassels	Parking and shuttle services
Commencement day schedule	Routes to campus
Food services	Seating Plan

On-campus housing, in residence halls, will be guaranteed for guests of graduates the night before Commencement if payment ($48 double occupancy) is received by March 31. Registration forms will be available after February 1 from University Conference Services, 918 Campus Center. No arrangements can be made before that date. The "Collegian" will carry further information at the beginning of the Spring Semester.

Tickets are not required and there is no limit on the number of guests you may invite.

There is no pre-Commencement rehearsal.

The Speaker will be announced in May.

For further information, please call the Visitors Center at 5-0306 or Student Affairs Special Services at 5-3480.

have decided to add some oriental spice to the English invasion by featuring round short collars, tunics with frog enclosures and silk pajama — like pants. Buyers can choose from a myriad of jewel like reds, blues and greens to add contrast, creating an interesting combination of texture and versatility.

If you are looking for something more casual, sweaters are the key to a weekend wardrobe. Currently, both cashmere and wool have sold big in sweaters of varying thickness, shape and design.

For the more outdoor type, Peruvian wool sweaters paired with leggings can be purchased in stores like the Gap, L.L. Bean and J. Crew. An array of sweater designs, patterns and colors allow a person to display individual tastes and creative flair.

To cover your winter finery, there are a number of choices. The pea coat, a Navy necessity, has come off the ships and into stores everywhere. It's warmth and unique shape allow it to be worn with almost anything.

Trench coats in leather rayon and cotton canvas have also made it big adding a touch of nostalgic charm bringing to mind Bogart and Becall.

Cloaks and capes in wool and velvet accent a Romantic outfit and are both warm and practical for covering evening clothes.

Fur coats have been highlighting designer evening dresses, but don't fret — faux is no longer "gauche". Faux fox, rabbit and mink not only please those who miss the luxurious look of furs, but also please animal activists, as well. Designers like Donna Salyer donate a portion of their coat profits to wild life preservation funds.

Winter's chill also takes a toll on one's feet and boots seem to be the "in" item. Whether it be ankle, thigh or hip length; leather, suede, or rubber; half inch, two inch, or five inch heel, there seems to be a boot out there for everyone and every outfit.

So this winter don't feel drab just because of the weather. With a little imagination, color and taste, no one has to have the winter blues.

donating time for the children and Popielarczyk has not regretted one moment of it.

"How can you not enjoy working with kids?," he said, adding that this is a "kid's time of year."

Popielarczyk also performed at the VIBES spring party last year. When asked why he comes back and does the shows he replied that it's a "nice way to give back to the community, especially around the holiday. They [VIBES] do a lot, they deserve a lot of credit."

Joe Laurie, Tom Ogden and Victor Chiang, brothers from Phi Kappa Sigma Fraternity were just three of the 60 UMass students who volunteered their time to help out at yesterday's party.

"Little kids are so fun to be around," said Chiang, a senior Computer Engineering major.

All three agreed that they would help out without a second thought next year. Milton Bradley, local clubs and community members donated money and toys to VIBES so the children were able to get presents at the party. Amherst resident Elle Labeda, saying her children may not have otherwise gotten gifts this year, was very grateful for the organization's parties.

QUOTE OF THE DAY
"I'd love to kiss you, but I just washed my hair."
– Bette Davis

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You could be on the second leg of a lucky streak. Mutual interests spark powerful plans. Events at a distance work to your benefit.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You may have to step up the tempo in order to take care of everything on your schedule. Prominent people appreciate you going that extra mile.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A loan or expenditure could be reckless or premature. Research done now will pay off handsomely in the days ahead.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Calling on family members to help you solve a financial problem will prevent any misunderstandings. Sell your creative ideas in the open market. Traffic snarls loom.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): It may be necessary to revise the family budget. Ask loved ones for suggestions. Someone who pouts is in need of attention.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Career matters enjoy generally favorable influences. Tend to loved one's needs before turning your attention to business. An excellent time to change jobs or residences.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Heed the words of a beautiful sermon. Put your good intentions into action! Focus your energies constructively instead of frittering them away.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Seize a golden opportunity to display your talents. A frank discussion with your mate or business partner will yield helpful information.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Unexpected insights and rewards come your way — use them wisely. A college student wins a contest. Be careful what you say to your romantic partner.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Your energies are at an all-time high today. If your co-workers seem uncooperative, move ahead on your own.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): An animated conversation arouses your interest. An important new relationship will flourish if you devote enough attention to it.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Verify financial information and stay on schedule to meet your goals. Spending a fun evening with friends will restore your flagging energy.

Salamander Crossing plays Black Sheep cafe

By BETH GOLDSTEIN
Collegian staff

Salamander Crossing, a three-man, one-woman bluegrass band, played to a sold-out crowd at the Black Sheep deli and bakery last Friday night.

With Rani Arbo on violin and lead vocals, Andrew Kinsey on bass and vocals, Jeff Kelliher on guitar and back-up vocals, and Wells Hodous on banjo and back-up vocals, the band played for two hours straight with just a 15 minute break and then came back for a 20 minute encore performance.

Kinsey described bluegrass, a type of country music, as typical American music from the '40s and '50s that is largely instrumental, but their style of bluegrass comes with a little more twang than usual.

"Salamander Crossing is not, however, strictly a bluegrass band," Kinsey said. "The show our group puts on is not just bluegrass, but also folk music, swing music and singer-songwriter music."

Now together for two years, Salamander Crossing started out as a trio when Kinsey, Kelliher, and Arbo met at a music store where Kelliher and Arbo bought supplies and Kinsey worked. The three musicians began playing on sidewalks and cafes when Hodous saw them one day in a coffee shop. And upon showing interest in their band, Hodous was immediately recruited.

Although they sound as if they practice 40 hours a week because of how well they harmonize each tune, Kelliher said they practice about one day a week because "everyone has their own day stuff."

"Every one of us has been a musician since we were kids," said Kinsey, "so we can learn things fairly easily and retain them better than most other people."

In addition to playing in the band, Arbo is a writer/editor for Family Fun magazine in Northampton. Kinsey books concerts at a Montague bookstore. Kelliher writes for a publishing company in South Deerfield, and Hodous is an engineering student at UMass, as well as a husband and a father.

Although this was their first time playing at the Black Sheep, Salamander Crossing has frequented many clubs, including the Iron Horse. And, they were not surprised by the sold-out audience Friday night because the entertainment room at the Black Sheep is relatively small for the regular crowd that now follows their act almost wherever it goes. Their taste in music, though, is about the only thing the people in this crowd have in common with each other.

"The people are of all different ages," Kinsey said. "They are professional types, students, families, everyone."

Kelliher said it is flattering to play for a crowd who have come for the sole reason to hear their music.

"When we first started playing, it was our good friends, our roommates, and our families that would come see us," Kelliher said. "But now, we play a show in these places, and we don't know anyone, and it's flattering because it means our band's reputation has been spreading through word of mouth."

Having established a local fan club, the band now plans to take its show on the road.

"Our next move," said Kinsey, "is to get out of the area, which is always a hard thing for a band to do."

But Salamander Crossing is well on their way already, after applying for a spot in a folk concert to be held in New York. Should they ever leave the local area, they will surely be missed.

Battle of Bands draws to close

Proceeds will benefit River Valley AIDS project

By MATT AUDETTE
Collegian Staff

It began with 60, was narrowed down to 33, and this past Sunday night the five best bands in the area duked it out at the first annual Western Massachusetts Battle Of The Bands finals at the Vertex in Hadley.

Organized by valley resident and UMass student Justin Gallant, the competition was a result of an idea Gallant devised with his fiancee over the summer.

"We thought that a competition such as a battle of the bands would bring exposure to the local music scene, but at the same time being a college student I wanted it to be done for a good cause," Gallant said.

Deciding that part of the proceeds would go to AIDS victims, Gallant began shopping his idea around to local charities, receiving the most positive response from the River Valley AIDS Project, an institution that gives financial and moral support to AIDS patients and their families.

"The money [raised by the competition] will go directly to the [AIDS patients] families to help with such things as food and transportation to see doctors," stated Alicia Otero, a case manager for the River Valley AIDS Project.

With added financial support from various local businesses, Gallant was able to put his plan into action. Sixty bands eagerly sent him demo tapes as well as a short biography. Out of the 60 entries, 33 were selected to compete in five different competitions at different venues throughout the Western Massachusetts area. The winners of each then advancing to the final round to be held at the Vertex.

The five talented finalists, Borderland, yel!, Birthmark, Slowpoke and Rapid Symphony decended upon the Vertex's stage this past Sunday night, battling for the title of "best band in Western Massachusetts", as well as $1000 and free studio time at the Northampton Recording Studios.

With styles ranging from metal to funk, each band put on a high intensity show that kept the enthusiastic audience of about 450 on their feet throughout the night.

While all the bands displayed remarkable talent, it was the groove-laden riffs of local favorites yel! who stole the show and caught the judges attention. With a strong set which contained everything from country-tinged rock, to a funky send-up of the Super Mario Brothers Theme, the band demonstrated their ability to play various musical styles with ease.

"We're just surprised," said keyboardist John Greene after the show. "I mean everyone here tonight was amazing!"

The band, who donated $200 of their winnings to The River Valley AIDS Project, plans to record a CD in the summer with their recording time and buy a van with money.

An estimated $1,000 dollars was raised for the River Valley AIDS Project, according to Gallant, and plans are already in the works for another competition next year.

Could I Have Mono?

QUESTION

Since I started college, I'm always so tired. My roommate told me I probably have mono. What is this and is it serious?

ANSWER

Mononucleosis, or "mono" for short, is an acute viral infection. The illness usually starts with a fever and headache, followed by swelling of the lymph glands in the neck, armpits, and groin, extreme fatigue, and a severe sore throat that may make swallowing difficult. The illness develops most often between the ages of 15 and 17. Kissing is a common method of transmitting the virus. If you suspect you have mono, contact your physician for an exam. Diagnosis is often obvious from the symptoms and from a blood test. Almost all patients recover after four to six weeks, and rest is needed for a month or so to allow the body's immune system to destroy the virus. If you have mono, contact sports will be prohibited for a time.

If you have a health-related question you'd like answered, or if you need a referral to an area physician, make a free call to the registered nurses at The Professionals at 784-CALL or 1-800-377-HEALTH.

Serbs shell market

Heavy artillery kills five, injures 27

By ALEXANDER G. HIGGINS
Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — Serb forces, taking aim at shoppers bartering for food and mourners burying their dead, shelled the Bosnian capital for five hours Monday. Five people were killed and at least 27 wounded.

It was the heaviest shelling in more than a week and came the day after the first infantry clashes in weeks between Serb forces besieging Sarajevo and the Muslim-led Bosnian army.

Violence is on the upsurge in the wake of the latest failed efforts to end Bosnia's 20-month war.

The first of Monday's shells landed on an outdoor market in a residential area of Sarajevo. Four people died and 16 were wounded. Shoppers scrambled under vendors' stalls or dashed across the street to the relative safety of an apartment building as the shelling continued.

Mourners at a nearby cemetery, burying a young woman and an old man killed last week, hit the ground when they heard the first explosion, then ran for cover amid the gravestones. Moments later shells began landing at the cemetery, Associated Press Photographer Morten Hvaal said. No one was injured at the cemetery.

The rest of the day's dead and wounded came from elsewhere in the city, which was shelled from around 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. Bosnian radio said Serbs in the hills ringing Sarajevo were firing tanks and mortars. By sundown, the big guns had quieted.

Ten-year-old Danijel Dorotic was playing with a friend in his family's sixth-floor apartment when a shell landed in front of the building.

"I heard the explosion and felt pain in my stomach," he said from his hospital bed, showing where shrapnel sliced his flesh.

"I called daddy. He came and took me into his arms. He told me not to be afraid. It is just a scratch. I hugged him, and it was better then," the boy said. "Mommy cried. But daddy carried me out on the street and stopped a van. They took me to the hospital, and now everything is fine."

Since war began, 14,600 children in Sarajevo have been wounded and 1,530 killed, according to the government. In all of Bosnia more than 200,000 peole have died.

The marketplace was crowded with people, shopping and trading for food, cigarettes and clothing, trying to survive a second winter of war.

Germain makes good on lucky break

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

Most of the Massachusetts basketball players have plaques above their lockers in the William D. Mullins Center, gold name plates, their own color photos. These are their lockers. Well, all but one of the players have this special treatment. They're the lucky ones.

You would think junior Jason Germain considers himself unlucky because above his locker he has a strip of athletic tape, name inscribed in pen, where his gold plate should be. But Germain, the 6-foot-1 guard from South Hadley, said he is just happy Massachusetts Coach John Calipari and his coaching staff gave him a chance.

Germain walked onto the No. 8 Minuteman team when guard Giddell Padilla left the squad, reportedly disappointed with the limited playing time he would have received this season. After Padilla made his decision and departed, Calipari said he needed to make a choice and fast.

"Heading into the season, we didn't hold walk-on tryouts because there wasn't any room on the team. Then Giddell quit two weeks in. We had a choice between opening up and having walk-on tryouts after a week of practice and conditioning, or if we knew of someone, invite him in," Calipari said.

Besides playing with the team in pick-up games, Germain had his break. It came in Boyden Gymnasium during another pick-up contest, this time against Massachusetts Associate Coach Bill Bayno. UMass senior forward Craig Berry said Germain's performance against Bayno was impressive and the story made its way back to the team.

"He was playing against Coach Bayno, breaking his ankles, taking him to the hole," Berry said. "Coach Bayno noticed him."

And that was it. Germain sat through a practice, played in one and a day later, he was wearing a practice uniform.

"I already knew some of the players, and I knew some of the coaches. I played against Bayno one night. It was a good night," Germain said. "My roommate [Matt Komer, a student manager of the team] came home and asked me if I was interested in walking on.

"The next day I went to the basketball office. I went to a practice. I watched it. They had that Friday off, and then that Saturday, I was in a practice uniform."

Walking onto a team is usually tough, and two weeks into the season is even tougher, getting adjusted to the schedule, the players, the coaches. But Germain's teammates have made him a part of the team.

"I think the way a person presents himself results in how you treat them, and Jason came in with a good attitude," co-captain Derek Kellogg said. "He just wanted to be a part of the team and do what he could to help. That's when we accepted him as a part of the team."

For now, Germain is counted on to push the other guys in practice and probably won't play much this year. He said he doesn't want to be anywhere else. He considers himself lucky.

UMass Equestrian jumping to new heights

By JUSTIN DOYLE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts equestrian team has been jumping for joy, literally.

The team finished its fall season tied for first place in the nation.

The team has just returned from an invitational competition held in New Jersey where the nation's top 20 teams in equestrian events competed.

"Collen Hayduk finished first in her division and various other UMass competitors placed as well," said Megan Zidle, the secretary of the UMass equestrian team and a rider.

The competition was just a preparation for teams for the nationals, but it was special for those who were asked to attend.

"Although the competition did not count in the point standings, it was an honor just to be invited with the top 20 teams in the nation," Zidle said.

The equestrian team attributes its new found success to second year coach, Wendy Cicciu.

"Cicciu has really helped in bringing everyone together," Zidle said. "She has made us work better as a team."

The equestrian team is not a varsity sport or a club. The team is represented by the Intercollegiate Horse Show Association.

They compete against teams as close as Smith and as far away as Texas A&M. But, their chief rival is the team from Mt. Holyoke.

"We ended up tied with Mt. Holyoke for first place in the nation," Zidle said.

"In three out the four competitions we have had this year, UMass and Mt. Holyoke have ended up one and two with only a few points separating us."

The UMass team is competing as a team and individually to make it to the National Competition held at Texas A&M in the spring.

First, they must qualify for the Regionals then the Zones competitions.

Teya Geiger, Jen Sykes and Zidle have already qualified for the Regionals.

Expectations for the team are high after the team's recent success.

"Our chances of going to the Nationals are great," Zidle said.

"Individually a lot of riders will make it."

The equestrian team's facilities are located at the Hadley Farm, behind the football stadium. Competitions will begin again in the spring.

Radiation, nuclear testing revealed

By H. JOSEF HEBERT
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The government has concealed more than 200 nuclear weapons tests since the 1940s and conducted about 800 radiation tests on humans, the Energy Department acknowledged Tuesday.

"It left me appalled, shocked and deeply saddened," said Energy Secretary Hazel O'Leary about information she learned only recently that 18 civilians had been injected with highly radioactive plutonium tests in the 1940s to determine what doses workers might be exposed to safely.

"It is apparent that informed consent could not have taken place," she said. All the individuals are dead, although many of them lived for years after the experiment.

Learning of the plutonium tests "just gave me an ache in my heart," she said.

Her department released summaries of previously secret information about nuclear tests in Nevada, the amount of plutonium produced and currently located at weapons factories, and limited information about government tests during the 1940s and '50s on humans to determine the health effects of radiation doses.

O'Leary said she was personally stunned by information she has received about the human testing, although she said she was prevented by privacy laws from disclosing details at this time.

Recently the Albuquerque Tribune reported the testing and identified five of the 18 individuals. Those five persons were injected with plutonium as part of work being done by the Manhattan Project in the 1940s in the development of the first atomic bomb.

O'Leary directed that as much information as possible be released on on the tests involving the 18 people, as well as about 800 other radiation tests involving some 600 individuals.

The fact that some tests were done on humans in connection with the government's nuclear program has been known for years, but few participants always were aware of the potential danger.

O'Leary said in the case of the 18 individuals whose cases are being investigated she would not rule out the possibility of a lawsuit against the government by survivors. The last of the 18 died two years ago.

Tara O'Toole, the DOE's assistant secretary for the environment, safety and health, said some of the 800 tests on which documents are being assembled were "perfectly legitimate, perfectly valid" but that others were clearly questionable.

O'Leary said of the plutonium-related tests "the majority of the experiments were clearly below...the standards of correctness."

The department said it conducted 204 more underground nuclear tests between 1963 and 1990 at its Nevada test range than previously had been announced, or about one-fifth more than officially acknowledged over the years.

Thirty-four of the tests resulted in some release of radiation into the environment, officials said.

First Lady hit with concerns

Clinton approached about high cost of health care

By KATHARINE WEBSTER
Associated Press

BOSTON — For the congressmen in attendance, there were nothing but affirmative nods yesterday as Hillary Rodham Clinton began a series of regional sales pitches for universal health care.

But as a Vermont dairy farmer and a Maine lobsterman showed in the meeting with New Englanders, there is still battle to do over the details of the plan.

David Cousens, a lobsterman from South Thomaston, Me., said he could barely afford insurance for his family, and having to pay health care costs for the sternman on his boat could break him.

"The economics don't add up for the working man," Cousens said.

Cousens said the price of lobster had dropped from $2.70 per pound to $2.30 in the past 10 years, while the cost of health insurance for his family of five had risen from $147 to $547 a month. His sternman, an independent contractor, carries no health insurance.

"If I could get some affordably for him, I'd do it, but there's no way," Cousens said.

Self-employed family farmer Melanie Carmichael told Mrs. Clinton that with dropping milk prices and rising insurance costs, her family couldn't afford to renew its health insurance in October. Her husband has been forced to take a job selling bull semen for artificial insemination of cows, but his new employer won't start providing insurance until January.

So when her son recently hurt his neck after being tackled by another kid on the playground, she panicked.

"I feel, Mrs. Clinton, right now that the cattle on my dairy farm are receiving better health care than my children," she said.

Man sentenced in Denny trial

By MICHAEL FLEEMAN
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A judge gave the maximum 10-year sentence Tuesday to the Black man convicted of viciously beating White truck driver Reginald Denny and attacking other motorists at the outset of last year's deadly riots.

"It's intolerable in this society to attack and maim people because of their race," Superior Court Judge John Ouderkirk said as he sent Damian William off to prison.

Ouderkirk sentenced Black co-defendant Henry Watson to probation until January 1997 and to 320 hours of community service.

Williams, 20, was convicted of attacking Denny and four Hispanic and Asian victims as a rampaging mob took to the streets on April 29, 1992, the first day of the Los Angeles riots that killed 55 people.

Watson, 29, was convicted of misdemeanor assault and pleaded guilty to an assault count against trucker Larry Tarvin. He served 17 months between his arrest and the trial.

The riots were unleashed by the state court acquittals of four White police officers in the videotaped beating of Black motorist Rodney King.

The attack on Denny was televised live from a news helicopter and his battered, bloody face became a symbol of the race riots.

Videotape showed Williams in a gleeful dance around Denny's body.

Williams' lawyer, Edi Faal, said his client once faced the possibility of two life sentences plus 47 years. Now, he said, Williams will be eligible for parole with four years' prison time. He was also fined $1,000. Faal said he would appeal the convictions.

"The jury spoke. We have now, I think, closed the chapter," said District Attorney Gil Garcetti.

US-EC clash on imports hinder talks

By DIRK BEVERIDGE
Associated Press

GENEVA — An American-European standoff on movies and airplanes is the latest stumbling block for a world trade deal, but the two sides said Tuesday they still have time to make peace before the final deadline.

The failure to resolve differences over import restrictions on movies and TV shows, and government subsidies for jetliner manufacturers came after the United States and European Community agreed on cutting farm subsides. The latter dispute had held up the world trade talks for years.

With the clock ticking away to the Dec. 15 deadline for completion of broader 116-nation talks on lowering trade barriers, negotiators criticized Washington and the EC for not settling all their differences.

Dec. 15 is the last day President Clinton can notify Congress of a proposed trade agreement under "fast-track" rules barring lawmakers from attaching amendments that could kill the accord.

The head of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, Peter Sutherland, described the trans-Atlantic squabbles as "incredible folly."

Japan's negotiator, Koro Bessho, said, "We are urging the United States and European Community to come to an agreement right now."

At stake is a trade package that could add more than $200 billion annually to the sluggish global economy by cutting customs duties on imported goods, easing border controls and adopting tougher measures against unfair trading. It is the

Tickets stolen out of a safe in UPC office

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

Five hundred tickets for Saturday night's Babatunde Olatunju concert were stolen out of a safe in the Union Program Council's (UPC) office Monday night.

According to Judy Gagnon, advisor to UPC, between the hours of 5 p.m. Monday and 1 p.m. yesterday afternoon, someone forced the safe open with a crowbar and took the tickets and a couple of empty bank deposit bags.

Gagnon did say she felt the break-in was "pretty weird" because the office has a stereo system, a coffee maker and lighting equipment. Everything else in the office was untouched.

Gagnon is warning students to only purchase the tickets at official ticket agencies which are Tickets Unlimited, For The Record and the Northampton Box Office. The stolen tickets are numbered and will not be honored at the event.

"There is concern, we don't want students to get ripped off," said Margaret Arsenault, the organizational advisor in the Student Activites Office.

"We want people to be aware," said a concerned Gagnon.

UPC officials declined to make a comment yesterday when the Collegian contacted them about action that would be taken concerning the stolen tickets.

"It's rather strange that they came after just what was in the safe," commented Andrew Jilani.

Babatunde Olatunji and his Drums of Passion is scheduled to appear at the Student Union Ballroom Saturday night. He is best known for introducing the Western culture to African music and his association to Grateful Dead percussionist Mickey Hart. In 1991, Olantinji was a partner in forming the percussion ensemble Planet Drum with Hart.

Chief of campus police tries to insure safety

By VANESSA ADELMAN
Collegian Staff

A police officer's job is not only difficult because of its requirements, but also because it is not abundant with day to day rewards.

University of Massachusetts Police Chief Jack Luippold became a police officer because he wanted to help people.

"I wanted to work with, and help others," he said, "so I decided I would like police work."

Luippold, 38, has the dual role of police chief and director of the Division of Public Safety which he has held for a little over a year. He has been chief since April 1992.

The over six-foot, lanky, mustached man oversees 50 police officers, 30 security officers, over 200 student security employees and is responsible for the safety of the entire campus community.

Luippold entered law enforcement when he participated in the community service program at Amherst Police Department while he was in college.

"I was a student at Westfield State and I knew what I wanted to do," he said. "So I decided to start in this community service program."

The program also included fire-fighting, Luippold said, which has very high rewards and a sense of immediate achievement.

According to Luippold, police work is very different than fire-fighting because you do not see the same type of rewards.

"When you put out a fire it is very simple," he said. "You automatically get thanks for putting out; you've done something good. When you arrest someone you don't have anyone thanking you right away."

Luippold said police officers must see beyond the immediate, and he has to keep reminding himself of that every once in a while.

He came to UMass in 1977 and worked up the ranks of the department.

Luippold said he loves working with the students. He explained this is one of the reasons he has stayed here.

"Students think in very refreshing ways," he said. "They keep me young and thinking young. It's the part of my job I still enjoy the most."

In spite of the chief's crammed schedule, he will still make time to meet with students when they call with concerns.

According to Luippold, it's not just the police department's job to have a safe campus, but we need to be working together in one large group.

"I really believe UMass is special," he said. "We're unique in terms of a university, and I believe we can all come together to make a difference."

Seniors study disease

Honor students show poster exhibition

By JUSTIN DOYLE
and TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

Chris McClure and Joel Swenson, two senior honors students at the University, have been researching leishmania, a deadly parasite that causes a debilitating disease, leishmaniasis.

This disease affects 12 million people worldwide, mostly in tropical and subtropical regions, and is thought to be a contributing cause of the "Persian Gulf disease" contracted by American military personnel during the Persian Gulf War.

McClure and Swenson presented their research at the 28th Annual Regional Meeting of the American Society for Microbiology.

The research seeks to determine whether certain herbs and plants can be used to treat the disease, thereby avoiding the toxic effects of other current treatments. "The drug we have now is very toxic," McClure said.

They also hope to find a treatment that is less expensive. Current cost of the treatment is $100 a day.

"That price tag puts the remedy out of range for many leishmaniasis patients living in the Third World," McClure said.

Both men work in the laboratory of Linda Nolan, the honors program director and a professor in the school of public health.

Swenson's research concentrated on plants Nolan and others collected during an expedition to the Amazon rain forest of Ecuador last summer.

McClure researched the medicinal effects of elephant garlic and licorice.

According to McClure, they have tested 15 products throughout last semester. He said two of the 15 were toxic toward leishmania and not toward human cells.

McClure said the work, which comprises both men's senior honors theses, is still being completed.

They presented their research through a poster exhibition entitled "Effect of Medicinal Plant Extracts on the Growth of Leishmania sp. and Mammalian Cell Lines".

They were the only two undergraduates to present a paper at the conference and the only other student presenters were two University graduates who are now attending Albany Medical College in Albany, N.Y.

and operations he experienced, and said he remembered nothing about the assault. He recently expressed forgiveness toward his attackers and said they should receive leniency.

Ouderkirk played the riot videotape again Tuesday as a reminder of the violence and explanation of his sentence.

"The court has considered that this crime involved great violence and acts involving cruelty, viciousness and callousness," he said.

Williams was convicted of felony mayhem for attacking Denny and four misdemeanor assault counts. The mayhem count carried a maximum eight-year term; each misdemeanor count, six months.

The UMass approach to "tolerance"

"Here, you take for granted the gift of living."

The man who said that to me eventually beat me playing pool in the University Pub by one ball. He was a South African post-graduate in Development Studies, and we were speaking of the greatest differences between living in England and our home countries.

Excluding the English as a category, I have met more foreign students here than in two years at UMass. I play snooker regularly with a Dane and basketball with three Cypriots and a Frenchman, had drinks bought for me and my friends by a drunken Kuwaiti, talked third world politics with a man from Afghanistan and live on a floor with guys from Syria, Greece, Poland, Nepal, and Lesotho. It is so much easier to meet foreign students now, seeing that I happen to be one of them.

"I'm from the States. . .Massachusetts . . no, west of Boston."

Nathan CRICK

The funny thing though, is that it sounds very exotic to meet all these people. It sounds exotic to me when i read what i have just written. However, in reality, all of them are just ordinary people, who happen to have heavy accents. The Syrian always ends his sentences by raising the pitch of his voice, so it sounds like he is humming a tune. None of the people who live outside of western Europe can pronounce my name. It's either David of Nah-tahn.

They may indeed have matured in a completely different society as the English, and hold a widely varied set of vaiues and customs, but they don't make it a point of displaying them to you. It's almost impossible to experience culture differences talking to one person. You have to be in the country to really do that.

It makes me think of UMass in a sense, trying so hard to make something called multi-culturalism work on a university scale. Making tolerance the cornerstone of its philosophy. it's kind of a funny word, "tolerance." I will not really appreciate or like you, but I will tolerate your presence beside me. I think we all say these kinds of things without even thinking about what they mean anymore. Just say yes and keep moving. Wear your pin and smile. Don't ask questions.

Promoting actual comraderie is an entirely different scenario, however. Being a foreigner now, I can tell you it's a hell of a lot easier to meet someone if they are making dinner alone than if they are crowding the kitchen with their friends and all speaking Greek. I could care iess what ethnicity someone may be, but for me to go up and say hello they must also be approachable. I met my first two people, the Kuwaiti fellow and a South African, because I wanted to know the rules to European pool and they were just sitting at a table in the Pub smoking quietly.

The UMass approach to "tolerance" is more of an intimidation strategy. We will separate everyone according to their ethnic background, and we dare you to test your tolerance by having to force yourself upon them and demand a cultural experience so your consciousness can be raised. I cannot even begin to explain how simply unreasonable this is if you want the intermix of cultures. There are good reasons for foreign students to be provided an opportunity to meet others from their country, but UMass not only provides completely separate living conditions, it provides them for separate groups of Americans.

Our problem is not solely in accepting differences, it is in magnifying them to the point where we may appear completely alien to one another. People are not so foreign if you speak the language, and fortunately most of us do. It's really not such a hard thing to realize after getting past the crap that so many people talk. I wonder if it'll ever happen to us, though. Things have gotten to a point where it makes me think one day Americans, of all backgrounds, will have to come to England to say, "Here, you take for granted the gift of living." That is, if we don't already.

Mr. Happy vs. the Evil Zipperzilla

Once again, my constant companion, Mr. Happy, has had a close encounter with the zipper on my jeans. I ran out of clean underwear today, so I wore my jeans over my naked tookus, and just now I went (as my mother would say) "winky-tinks" into the toilet. When I was done, I routinely pulled up the zipper, but, being careless, somebody real sensitive and important got snagged in the zipper's teeth.

And it hurt. Very much. I stifled a scream.

Mark Tyler
WENHAM

I can tell you personally that it's bad news when your zipper gets a whiff of the Lorena Bobbitt agenda. Men who are reading this are probably grimacing in understanding. I'm quite sure, however, that most of the women reading this are snickering delightedly at the wonderful thought of men inflicting pain on their own Little Man Johnsons.

Yet, what is perhaps worse than initially getting your Happy Boy caught in a zipper is the next part: unzipping and releasing him. Getting him snarled in the zipper's teeth is a painful surprise, to be sure, but at least you didn't know it was gonna happen. To unzip and let him loose involves anticipating the pain that will result with the UNsnarling. it's that element of expectancy that makes the difference. Somehow, knowing that you're about to feel a great deal of pain makes the pain much worse when it happens.

So i braced myself, sent a brief prayer to Heaven, and wrenched the zipper down. YOW! it hurt. Not to get too explicit here, but there's now an angry red welt gleefully blazing away on what has become the UNhappy Boy.

But what's really terrible about this kind of a masculine household accident is that the pain expands like a nuclear mushroom cloud and seizes up your stomach and most of your organs. Including, of course, the brain...which, with men, is mostly a sluggish, underused organ, except when something —anything— is either happening or could happen to Mr. Happy, be it good or bad. There is no place on the male body that not only feels so much pain by itself, but which can also telegraph that pain to every other cell in the body.

I mean, have you ever really looked at the way zipper teeth operate? Zippers are basically medieval shredding machines that some bright pinhead decided to install on pants. Good move. Zippers aren't much of a problem for you women, except if you aren't wearing grungy-undies and a wayward, overly adventurous curly hair gets pulled. This is a nasty little shock — I know from experience (yes, I've been through puberty, just like you)— but still nothing like the disaster that awaits a man and Russel the Love Muscle.

So then you think: why doesn't he just risk wearing a pair of dirty undies? Really, maybe you would do that, but I simply won't. Especially since i don't consider a pair of undies dirty until it's been worn for at least three weeks. Once it's hardened up like petrified wood —underwear rigor mortis — I refuse to wear them anymore, danger or not.

Oh, I'm just kidding! Really. I would never wear a single pair of grundgies for three weeks. Good Lord, no....

One week, tops.

What is the University afraid of?

Who exactly is in charge over at Whitmore? Is it the Chancellor, the Registrar, Al Haig? Clearly there's a serious problem in the chain of command when a simple request from the SGA, ostensibly supported by the Chancellor, is delayed for weeks upon weeks, with the lame excuse that underlings (Registrar) and bureaucracy (the Directory Information Committee) need to be in the loop.

The SGA asked for a disc copy of a list of the permanent home addresses of UMass undergraduates, to educate the students and their families about the potential of serious budget cuts (estimated $10-12 miiiion) facing the campus for the next academic year. One would think the administration would be happy the SGA is taking it upon themselves to lobby against the cuts for the benefit of the University.

The administration feigns support, and applauds SGA's intention, repeatedly promising them the list. But in fact, no such list has been forthcoming — they seem willing only to part with local student addresses. The latest rumor is the students will get their list in January, well after the crucial tuition fight has been settled.

What is the administration afraid of? Student empowerment? More money for the University? No budget cuts? Or maybe the fact that students' parents might find out they are paying overinflated prices for a diminished and devalued education. Indeed, more and more of the University's budget is going to top level administration's salaries and expenses, and less and less to the actual offering of courses and teaching of students (what is our mission anyway?).

While the administration may be reluctant to have word of their bureaucratic irresponsibiiity reach those who are footing the bill for Whitmore salaries and expense accounts, Scott, et al, may find themselves playing a dangerous game of chicken, the only outcome of which will be further and unnecessary embarrassment to this University.

The cold reality of a nude dancer

This fall the Collegian ran a series of editorials addressing advertisements for Anthony's Pub, a men's bar featuring nude female dancers. One argued that the Collegian should cease advertising for Anthony's because nude dancing contributes to sexist attitudes against women [Collegian, Sept. 23]. The next was written by a woman currently employed as an exotic dancer who claims dancing gives her a sense of power [Collegian, Oct. 26]. The final was written by the editor of the Collegian who equated the discontinuation of the advertisements with a violation of First Amendment rights to free speech [Collegian, Nov.5].

I would like to respond to the second and third letters in the series. I was a stripper for eight months, for five I was employed at Anthony's. I never found the experience uplifting or empowering in any way. I felt diminished every time I danced out onto the stage and looked into the leering eyes of my "audience." At Anthony's, the men would wave dollar bills to call me over to them. I was expected to perform tricks for them, and like a caged monkey, I did. Never did it make me feel strong or sexy. It didn't affirm the power of my womanhood. It made me feel sick and degraded.

Let me ask the woman who wrote in about the self-pride she gains from dancing: Do you use your real name when you work as a stripper? I didn't. My name was Dusty. Does your mother know you're a dancer? Your father? How does it make you feel when a customer offers you a big tip — say $20 — if you'll go out to his car with him and "give him a little?" Aren't you scared when a man follows you out of the bar into the unlit parking lot? Or frightened when the headlights of his car follow you home? Don't you know that if (goddess forbid) you are raped, it will be you who's interrogated before the jury? Don't you know they'll say you asked for it?

As a dancer I led a double-life. I had two names — one for dancing and one for the rest of my life. I had two jobs and two sets of friends who never knew about each other. I had two wardrobes — one which include g-strings and spiked heels. I had two personas — one was serious and intelligent, the other was hard and crass. I had to divide myself in this way in order to ensure some semblance of normalcy in my life. I lived in a self-induced schizophrenic state.

As time passed, I worked less and less at my nursing job and more at the bars. I took home less and less money from dancing because I had to numb myself to reality by using drugs and alcohol in order to keep getting up on that stage. I hurt so much inside that there were days when I couldn't get out of bed. All I could do was cry.

This month marks the seventh anniversary of the birth of Dusty. This is the first time I've spoken about her publicly. It's taken me this long to heal the shame and the pain which came out of my experience as a dancer. I've spent a quarter of my life repairing the damage done to my self-esteem in the eight months I spent as a dancer. Don't talk to me about women empowering themselves through degradation.

To the Collegian I ask, since when is refusing advertisers a violation of free speech.? Isn't your paper a free enterprise? Is the Collegian so dependent on the $130 per week you receive from Anthony's that it would fold if you pulled the ads? Ask yourselves this: How many of your readers' voices are silenced when they see those advertisements? It nearly silenced me. How many of us have been called prudish, conservative and sexless because we disdain the sexual objectification of women everywhere?

Every time the Collegian runs an advertisement for Anthony's or another strip-joint, you are telling your male readers that participating in this kind of "entertainment" is harmless, normal and even healthy to objectify women.

Stop promoting the degradation of women in your newspaper. Don't take another payment from Anthony's for advertisement. Don't participate in the spirit-murder of the women employed there. Stop promoting this degradation.

To the "patron's" of Anthony's I ask that the next time you find yourself seated in the front-row, remember that the dancer doesn't see your humanity any more than you see hers. Remember that she's utterly alone and scared of you. Remember she's a human being. Each time you slip a dollar bill into her g-string, you're throwing roses on her grave.

most ambitious trade reform package ever undertaken.

After a 24-hour negotiating session, U.S. Trade Representative Mickey Kantor and his EC counterpart, Sir Leon Brittan, were upbeat.

Kantor said there was "absolutely and without a doubt" time to wrap up an overall GATT deal.

"This is not a game," Kantor said. "We're playing for jobs and growth and economic leadership in the world."

Kantor was flying back to Washington without meeting again with Brittan, and it remained unclear who the U.S. and EC negotiators could come to terms on the film and aircraft now.

Many Europeans fear lowering barriers to entertainment programs would bring an invasion by Hollywood that could wipe out the local filmmaking industry that is viewed as an important part of European culture.

The United States and the EC also remain at odds over subsides to aircraft manufacturers.

Washington has complained for years about government subsidies to Airbus Industrie, a consortium of companies from Britain, France, Spain, and Germany that now rivals America's planemaking giants, Boeing and McDonnell Douglas.

Kantor said the United States had tried to accommodate Europe's stand on those issues, but "we didn't find the same kind of flexibility on the part of the Europeans."

Brittan said he thought the two sides were getting close on resolving the plane dispute, but he seemed less optimistic in the film battle.

"Whatever disagreements remain . . . we will succeed in the end because we must succeed," Canadian Trade Minister Row Maclaren told reporters.

Maclaren said the EC-U.S. farm subsidies deal was acceptable to his country, even though the short-term cuts in farm subsides were less than originally sought.

Canada, Australia and Brazil are all big farm exporters that have been hurt by U.S. and EC subsidies that keep prides low for American and European foods on world markets.

Virginia Kelley to write a book

President Clinton's mother ready to tell her life story

By RON FOURNIER
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The nation's First Mom, Virginia Kelley, is making time between poker and the ponies to write about her sons, her husbands and her uphill battle with cancer.

The book, the poker, the horse racing — not to mention the fishing, shopping, speeches and lunch on Fridays with the ladies — are in keeping with her own advice. Stay on the go, she told a women's group in a speech about cancer, "to get your mind off your problems."

One of her closest friends, Estelle T. Blair of Hot Springs, Ark., marvels at her ever-optimist pal. "She's always a-runnin' and gettin' and goin'. She never stops."

Much of Mrs. Kelley's time is spent on an as-yet untitled book that will be published next year by Simon and Schuster, documenting "a very personal story of her own journey," said her Washington attorney, Robert Barnett.

Mrs. Kelley is working with an author to produce an autobiography that will address "the problems with her husband, her battle against breast cancer, her love of horse racing and her affection for Elvis Presley," he said.

Mrs. Kelley buried three husbands, one an abusive alcoholic. She moved away from her older child for two years to further her education, helped her other child through a drug addiction and late in life fought breast cancer with a radical mastectomy.

Friends say her cancer has resurfaced, and she is undergoing chemotherapy. The White House will not comment about her health, and Mrs. Kelley — a chatty, colorful character in scores of interviews during her son's campaign — is politely declining requests from journalists now.

There have been no hints of her private struggle.

Speaking to a group fighting breast cancer in October, Clinton referred to his "brave mother who struggles on with her breast cancer condition and who has resumed her remarkable life."

In one of a series of speeches on breast cancer, Mrs. Kelley told a group of Louisiana bankers' wives last month, "I don't know how much time I have. But I told my doctor I refused to go until they find a cure for this thing."

Meanwhile, she's keeping busy.

Greg Cyr, who employs 20 people at Cyr Lumber in Portage, Me., said President Clinton's plan could cost him as much as $45,000 a year. The plan would require small business owners to pay up to 7.9 percent of their payroll towards health coverage for their workers, or 80 percent of employee premiums, whichever is lower.

Cyr acknowledged his costs would probably be capped at less than 80 percent of his workers' coverage, but said he expected the government to raise the cap in the near future because it wouldn't cover the real costs of health care.

"Ma'am, my heart says we need national health care. My head says we can't afford it," Cyr said.

"In the case of a single employee . . . the combined total of what you're paying for the employee and yourself will be less than what you currently pay just for your family," Mrs. Clinton responded.

The president's plan also would charge small businesses on a sliding scale, she said, capping some businesses' costs at as little as 3.1 percent of payroll. She asked small business owners to do the math, including the discounts they'd be entitled to.

But Carl Lindblade, general manager of seven Red Jacket Inns in New Hampshire and Massachusetts, said he had done the math. Premiums under the president's plan would cost about $80,000 a year for his company, which hires as many as 600 full and part-time workers during the summer.

UNDERGRADUATE COMMENCEMENT
Bachelor's Degree Candidates
Preliminary Information

Undergraduate Commencement 1994 will be held Sunday, May 22, at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium, 10:30am to 11:45am. The ceremony will take place there rain or shine.

Seniors whose degree requirements will be completed in February, May, or September 1994 are eligible to participate. If you are unsure of your academic status or have questions in this regard, please immediately contact a member of the "Senior Staff", Records Office, 207 Whitmore, 5-0555.

An informational brochure about Commencement and related matters will be mailed to prospective graduates and parents between mid-February and early March. Details about the ceremony itself will be contained in a mailing to graduates in early May. Similar information will also be in the last issue of the "Collegian" in the Spring.

The first mailing will include information about:

- Announcement packets
- Caps, gowns, tassels
- Commencement day schedule
- Food services
- Housing (on-campus)
- Parking and shuttle services
- Routes to campus
- Seating Plan

On-campus housing, in residence halls, will be guaranteed for guests of graduates the night before Commencement if payment ($48 double occupancy) is received by March 31. Registration forms will be available after February 1 from University Conference Services, 918 Campus Center. No arrangements can be made before that date. The "Collegian" will carry further information at the beginning of the Spring Semester.

Tickets are not required and there is no limit on the number of guests you may invite.

There is no pre-Commencement rehearsal.

The Speaker will be announced in May.

For further information, please call the Visitors Center at 5-0306 or Student Affairs Special Services at 5-3480.
Congratulations to all concerned.

University to add two women's programs?

By TRUDY TYNAN
Associated Press

AMHERST (AP)— University of Massachusetts administrators said Tuesday they have asked trustees to establish two new varsity teams for women- water polo and crew– at the Amherst campus.

The two new teams would bring the number of varsity teams for women to 15. With the addition of ice hockey and the reinstatement of men's tennis this fall, the 22,000-student campus has 14 varsity teams for men.

Chancellor David Scoot, the top campus official, said the move would advance "our gender equity program for athletics asa whole." Federal legislation requires efforts to achieve equality between men's and women's programs.

Scott said the campus now has strong informal women's clubs in both crew and water polo, which he said are growing in popularity nationwide.

This spring, the University reinstated three varsity sports for women- tennis, volleyball and lacrosse- as part of an out-of-court settlement with women athletes. The University dropped the women's teams during several years of state cutbacks.

Although several men's teams were threatened, only men's tennis was eliminated. The women hired a lawyer after administrators allowed the men's soccer team to continue with their promise of private funding, but not the women's tennis team.

As part of the settlement, the University also pledged to improve scholarship aid and athletic opportunities for women over five years.

Under the proposal, now before trustees committee, scholarship aid for women athletes would be raised from $1.1 million to $1.6 million in the next school year. The University plans to spend a total of $1.7 million on scholarships for male athletes in the coming school year, said spokeswoman Karin Sherbin.

Although crew has been a popular sport for both men and women at the secondary and college level in New England for many years and the University has an active women's club team, water polo is still primarily a California sport.

None of its member high schools, public or private, currently have water polo teams for either boys or girls according to the Massachusetts Interscholastic Athletic Association.

"It's an emerging sport, especially for women," said Russ Yarworth, coach of the men's water polo team at Massachusetts.

About 50 schools nationwide have men's teams, he said. Only two eastern schools- Slippery Rock State in Pennsylvania and Harvard- currently have varsity women's teams, but about 18 eastern schools have started club teams, he said.

The women's game is similar to the men's with six players plus a goalie on a side, but they use a shorter pool and smaller ball, he said.

The success of the Massachusetts men's team has also caught campus interest. The Minutemen finished sixth in the NCAA water polo tournament, held two weeks ago in Long Beach, Calif. Navy was the only other non-California school in the eight team field.

"Black Nativity" celebrated in Northampton

By MARTIN JONES
Collegian Staff

"Black Nativity", a Christmas musical based upon the traditional Nativity story, is the latest masterpiece to be performed by the First World Images Theater group based in Amherst.

The play is being performed at First Churches in Northampton and is sponsored by the Committee for Northampton, a group of local residents dedicated to addressing racism in the community.

Written by Langston Hughes in the late 1950s, the play offers a new perspective of the traditional Christmas nativity story, with Black actors and actresses portraying Mary, Joseph, a shepherd, and the three Kings. The cast is made up of Amherst Regional High School students and graduates, according to director Ingrid K. Askew.

Askew said the most important aspect of the play is that it provides a version of the nativity story that African- Americans can better identify with.

"I think what makes it different is that we're looking at the nativity story from a very different lens," she said.

Told from an African American point-of-view, the play uses a number of styles, including music and dance, to convey a colorful mosaic of the various elements of black art and spirituality. The Rev. Peter Ives, pastor of First Churches and a member of the Committee for Northampton, described the play an ideal event for his group to sponsor.

"It's a powerful pageant for the Christmas season, but from a different perspective than what we are commonly familiar with," he said. "It's important to hear this story from many different perspectives to truly understand the story itself."

The play was first performed in New York about 30 years ago and in Boston about 10 years later. This season's performance will be the first Western Massachusetts performance.

The original production included the famed Alexander Brandford Gospel Choir of New York, and recruited an all-star lineup of dancers, including the young Alvin Ailey.

The Northampton production features gospel singing throughout the performance by the Western Mass. District Choir. There is also extensive choreography directed by choreographer Karen Donaldson, who also works for First World Images Theater.

Following the first act of the play, which focuses on the traditional nativity story, the second act of the play features a dance segment called "Pressure of the World," with music from the R&B/Gospel group Sounds of Blackness.

Askew, who has done extensive research into the play's history calls the Black Nativity "a classic."

"In Roxbury, in the black community, it's a tradition," said Askew. "It should be shown more nationwide."

Black Nativity will be playing its last two performances on Dec. 17 and 18 at 8 p.m. at First Churches in Northampton. Tickets are $10 and $5 for students and senior citizens. For more information, call 584-9392, or 585-4985.

A celebration of Kwanzaa

By MARC COUSINS
Collegian Staff

Green, black and red were the basic color schemes adorning the walls of the Malcolm X Cultural Center for its annual Kwanzaa celebration that was held on Sunday Dec. 5, 1993.

The atmosphere was one of cordial enjoyment as the students of the University of Massachusetts came together to celebrate this African-American Cultural Holiday.

The entertainment ranged from a jazz band to a Gospel Choir to a skit performed by Casa Dominicana, a cultural club native to UMass.

"I was inspired by the unity and interaction. The skit that was performed by Casa Dominicana that I've decided to incorporate similar entertainment in our Holiday Gala," said John Belizaire, public relations director for the Hatian-American Student Association (HASA).

Along with the skit, the University Jazz Band and the Gospel Choir were also duly appreciated as African-American music filled the building.

The Kwanzaa celebration was enjoyed by all and helped to engender a spirit of holiday unity in the campus community.

What is Kwanzaa?

By MARC COUSINS
Collegian Staff

Kwanzaa, celebrated from Dec. 26 throughout Jan. 1 by over 13 million Americans, is a unique African-American holiday that was created in 1966 by Dr. Maulana Karenga, the leader of US, a national organization of African-Americans whose goal is to continue the process of cultural restoration.

Based on African agricultural celebrations, it is neither a religious or heroic holiday, but a cultural holiday created with the understanding that it might be another option or addition to African-Americans who wish to celebrate during the holiday season.

Kwanzaa which is taken from the Kiswahili phrase "matunda ya kwanzaa" which means "first fruits" which gives us its base as a first fruit celebration among many of the various countries of Africa. It was created to allow African-Americans to restore their African heritage and culture, to introduce the Nguzo Sabo (The Seven Principles), to address the fact that their were no African-American holidays barring those few that deal with heroic figures, to serve as a communal celebration bringing the people together to make new bonds and strengthen old ones, and perhaps most importantly, to show a self-conscious decision to redefine our world as African-American into a community that reflects progress towards our goals and interests.

The Nguzo Saba was created as the core of Kwanzaa. It is deemed, by Dr. Karenga and US, as the minimum set of values African-Americans need to reconstruct and rescue their lives. The values found in the Nguzo Saba were also ones reflecting prevalent Pan-African beliefs. The Nguzo Saba was created with the struggle we have at hand in mind to aid us and lend support to African-American efforts.

Five common sets of values found in most African first fruits celebrations helped to form the the practices and values of Kwanzaa. The ingathering of the people, which is considered to be any communities' greatest asset or product, to foster better relationships and improve mutual welfare. Profound reverence for the Creator and the creation, to give praise and due respect to God and everything that is from him. Commemoration of the Past, to honor ancestors and give respect to rite and ceremonies that keep the culture strong and educated. Recommitment to Cultural ideals, to keep the culture ever evaluating itself in a effort to better itself and it's people. Celebration of the Good, a celebration of thanksgiving to all that is good.

Finally, Kwanzaa is based both on tradition and reason. Tradition being our starting point and our anchor. Reason being the critical thought about our tradition that enables us to select, preserve, and build on what we have produced.

"Parting Words"

By DENISE HENRY

The Black Mass Communications Project's annual Jeans and T-Shirt party was cancelled because some students of color did not want to lend their support to BMCP and sign up for security. Because of this, the project was unable to put on a party that has drawn students and alumni to UMass's campus for over 15 years.

Unfortunately for the past, present and future BMCP members, there is no 16th Annual Jeans and T-Shirt party to reminisce over.

In answer to the questions that the BMCP board has been hearing around campus since the event was canceled . . .

No. The Jeans and T-Shirt party will not take place during the Spring semester. BMCP's party was the biggest party of the Fall semester- at least Fall of 1992.

For those students who did sign up (and show up) for security on the night of the party, thank you for your support. The BMCP board only hopes that there are enough of you around next year to see that the incoming students get to experience a Jeans and T-shirt party.

For those students who approached the BMCP board concerning security, but were told that security was "all set", the board, we would like to apologize. In the future, we will accept as many who show interst. If the amount is large (which we hope it would be), we will handle it the best way we can.

The harsh reality is, that if situations like this continue to occur, the social, cultural and educational programs that are enjoyed by all will cease to exist. Then the general consensus from students will be:

"There are no events for the Black community... It' s not fair..."

Well this was the overall consensus of 25 years ago. The result was the contruction of the Black Mass Communications Project and other valuable students for the ALANA community. We hope that there are enough students of color out there who are committed enough to make the four years at this university somewhat enjoyable for the small percentage of us on this campus.

Organizational membership in the Registered Student Organizations needs to increase. These organizations have been around for too long. We would hate to see them become non-existent because of lack of support.

Oh, and last but certainly not least, let us not forget the very talented BMCP DJ's and their time slots on WMUA. The music that they love to play, and we all love to listen to, will no longer exist.

And what will be the response from the administration when they hear our community complain?

"We gave it to you. These organizations were there for you, and you did not show any type of interest in having them stay around for years to come. You let them go, deal with it."

And you know what, you will. Because, like the old saying goes, "you don't know a good thing 'till it's gone!"

Midnight Madness, Daylight Sadness

For the first time in the history of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, the basketball team is ranked in the top ten of the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) poll ranking. In recent conversations with students, several of them claimed that this is "big."

The univerity has finally been recognized as a national figure in college basketball. Students are proud to be Minutemen, partly, because a good number of their friends from home (Boston, Hartford, Springfield, Vermont, etc.) are calling, wanting tickets to attend UMass games. In the eyes of many students, staff, faculty and administrators, we (UMass) are truly a national powerhouse in basketball.

Wayne R.
MILLETTE

The university made national headlines when it defeated the number one ranked team in the country, North Carolina. By many standards, I must agree with many on the campus who believe that indeed, we have a first rate basketball team, that is truly second to none.

The excitement level is very high on campus because of the suburb level players and the recent rankings in the polls. The level of excitement witnessed at "Midnight Madness" was incredible. From talking to veterans on campus, they point out that this level of campus spirit has never been experienced before.

The centerpiece of all the excitement and elevation in campus spirit is the basketball team. The players all should be credited with turning what was a non-existing basketball program at UMass into a national giant. The coach, John Calipari, and his assistants also need to be recognized for their guidance in the team's turnaround.

However, the sad aspect of what otherwise has been an excellent program is the very low graduation rate of our basketball players. There is, in Division One athletics, a disproportionate number of African American male athletes relative to the number of African American males enrolled in these Division One institutions; UMass is no exception.

African American males make up 65 percent of the football and basketball squads nationally, but only 4 percent of general university populations (DEALY, 1990). While recruitment can provide the opportunity to gain an education, the university administration, the athletic department and the coach, John Calipari himself, must address questions such as: "How many African American athletes succeed in earning a degree? Do universities treat athletes as students first, then athletes, or simply as revenue producing agents?"

I think back to the great players such as Jim McCoy, William Herndon, Tony Barbee, Harper Williams, Anton Brown and Kennard Robinson of the last couple of years who have paved the way in getting UMass to where we are today. Where are these palyers today? How many hold a degree from the University of Massachusetts?

One thing seems clear: all the players mentioned are no longer elligible to play for the university. The question is, "how many of these players graduated?" An even more important question is: Why so few have graduated?

Make no mistake, I am quite proud to share in the new found excitement on campus, but it is important to say, it saddens me to witness the players leave the university without a degree. I truly believe that the university and its coaches should be held responsible for making sure our super athletes and revenue makers of today-yes- REVENUE MAKERS- become "average", or at least graduate.

There are some Division One institutions that do a good job in graduating its basketball players. According to a report recently published by USA Today, Duke University graduates 91% of its basketball players; North Carolina, 80%, Boston College, 75%, Providence College, 88% and Rutgers University, 45%. Unfortunately, the University of Massachsetts falls short of the institutions mentioned. Coach Calipari and the basketball program should use some of these instutions as examples and models in providing necessary tutoring to all its players. There is also the question of recruiting the caliber of student that can realistically complete university academic requirements in order to matriculate.

To all the basketball players, and coaches, I will continue to be a big fan and even bigger supporter of the team. Most important though, I hope to see all the players graduate and leave this campus when their eligibility is up, with a degree.

Wayne R. Millette is a UMass Graduate student and Residence Director.

Porter's reasons for guilty plea

Former priest doesn't remember molesting children

FALL RIVER, Mass.(AP) — Former Roman Catholic priest James Porter says he regrets having sexually abusing children, but doesn't remember details of the crimes.

"Since I had shock treatment, I don't remember anything about the crimes of the people I am accused of molesting in North Attleboro and Fall River," he told the Herald News of Fall River.

Last year, he told a television reporter in a taped interview he had molested "50 to 100" children while a priest in Massachusetts. But he said he wasn't sure of the number.

He told the newspaper he knew he was attracted to children while he was a priest in Fall River and North Attleboro in the 1960s, and felt if the victims accused him of specific actions, then he must have been guilty.

"I have suffered a helluva lot thinking about the horrible things I have done," Porter said. "I want everyone to know I regret it. I want everyone to know I'm sorry."

"I just wasn't going to put my wife and kids through the pain of a public trial," Porter said in the newspaper interview, explaining why he pleaded guilty to charges in Massachusetts.

"Christ, can you imagine how much crap they would have dragged out and, since I have no real memory of the incidents, I wouldn't be able to defend myself."

Porter was sentenced in Bristol Superior Court on Monday to 18 to 20 years in prison. He will be eligible for parole in six years.

He said in the interview on the eve of his sentencing he had his pedophilia under control and hoped the judge would sentence him to treatment in Minnesota where he could be near his wife and four children. After sentencing Monday, he said he was "devastated."

"These things I am accused of doing are horrible, despicable acts, but Jeeze, it was the Church that sent me from one parish to another," he said.

"Where is the Church now? The diocese called for prayers for Father Paul Connolly. Where are the prayers for Jim Porter? More important, where are the prayers for his wife and children?" Porter sobbed.

Of the charges against him, Porter said, "I don't think I ever penetrated any kids. I know I would rub against them sometimes and the ultimate for me was to be able to rub my bare body against their bare body. The charges that I penetrated them are outrageous."

He said he went to New Mexico for treatment at the suggestion of a friend. But because he left the state, the Massachusetts statute of limitations was put on hold, making his prosecution possible.

"If the treatment center were in Worcester, I wouldn't have left the state and tonight I would not be sitting here wondering whether I will ever be back with my family again," Porter said.

Porter's wife Verlyne, said "these so-called Porter victims" should forgive her husband.

"He was sick," she said. "The hate they have will eat away at them. For their own sakes they must put the hurt behind them."

"Jim is not an evil man," Verlyne said. "I want everyone to know that. He had his problems and he had sickness, but he is not evil."

The newspaper said Porter sobbed again as he told how his children wanted to put up the Christmas tree right after Thanksgiving because their father would be leaving early in December.

Clown protests nuclear move

FLORIDA, Mass.(AP) — An anti-nuclear protester in a clown suit parked a bus in a roadway yesterday and temporarily blocked a rig hauling a radioactive 93-ton generator for the closed Yankee Rowe atomic plant.

State police arrested the protester, Joshua Dostis, 52, of New Salem. He was charged with disorderly conduct in North Adams District Court and freed on $250 bail to await another court date on Dec. 29.

It was the latest confrontation between plant officials and activists who want to stop shipments of components from the plant to a South Carolina dump for low-level radioactive waste.

On Tuesday, a rig from Chem-Nuclear Systems of Columbia, S.C., was hauling the third of four generators in a series of shipments that began last month. The company was hired for the job by Yankee Atomic Electric Co., which ran the reactor and still oversees it in Rowe, in the state's northwestern corner.

The protester stopped the bus, which was painted with anti-nuclear slogans, on a country road in the town of Florida about a quarter mile from a railroad siding where the generators are put on tracks for the journey south.

Dostis, whose clown suit carried the colors and stars of the American flag, then locked himself inside the bus and attached himself to the steering wheel with handcuffs. He later showed toy handcuffs that he said he had used.

About 30 other protesters watched, including two who briefly climbed atop the bus.

A tow truck hauled off the bus with the protester inside. Dostis agreed to come about a half mile down the road, where he was arrested.

The generator, delayed for less than an hour, was sent back on its way.

Dostis is a professional clown. But Debby Katz, president of the anti-nuclear Citizens Awereness Network in nearby Shelburne Falls, suggested that he wore the outfit to say that the decommissioning process at the plant is making a mockery of the democratic principles of the U.S. Constitution.

Katz said Dostis mounted Tuesday's protest on his own.

But her group has also challenged and protested the shipments, saying they pose a danger of accident and also expose people unnecessarily to low-level radiation.

"I don't think it's good for us to receive any radiation above the background" in the atmosphere, she said.

The activists say the radioactive parts should remain on site for decades to let the radioactivity dissipate. They say federal regulators were wrong to approve the shipments before an entire decommissioning plan was reviewed.

But both Yankee officials and federal regulators have said the shipments can be done safely.

Yankee Row spokesman William McGee dismissed Tuesday's protest as "a nuisance and an inconvenience."

McGee said the last of the four generators was still scheduled to leave the plant Wednesday. Plant officials are trying to beat a June 1994 deadline for shipping material from out of the region to the dump in Barnwell, S.C.

Actor Ameche dies of cancer at the age 85

By HILLARY CHURA
Associated Press

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. — Don Ameche, the dashing leading man of the 1930s and '40s who won his only Oscar for his portrayal of an elderly swinger in the movie "Cocoon", died of cancer at age 85.

Ameche worked until the end, rushing to finish his work in "Corinna, Corinna," a family drama starring Whoopi Goldberg and Ray Liotta.

Ameche died Monday night at the home of his son, Don Jr. He was diagnosed with prostate cancer about 13 months ago, but by then it had spread throughout his body, his son said.

Like the retirees in "Cocoon" who drew vitality from aliens stranded on Earth, Ameche's rebirth on the big screen was a source of joy in his later years, the younger Ameche said Tuesday.

"He would say to me, 'Isn't this incredible,'" Don Jr. said. "He loved it. He always was just amazed by it."

When he received an Academy Award at age 79 in 1986, as best supporting actor, he remarked: "For all you members of the academy, this esteemed gentleman (the Oscar) says that you have given me recognition. You've given me your love; I hope that I have earned your respect."

Already a radio star in early 1930s, Ameche made a smooth transition to films, beginning with "Sins of Man" in 1936. During 12 years at 20th Century Fox, he appeared in musicals, comedies and biographical dramas, most notably "The Story of Alexander Graham Bell".

Ameche lived in his home near Don Jr. until two and a half weeks ago, when he moved in with his son and his son's wife, Carol.

Pearl Street salutes semester with trio of talent

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

Kiss the semester goodbye in style. Pearl Street is featuring three top-notch concerts on three consecutive evenings.

Thursday - God Street Wine
9 p.m. Tickets $5, 18+

New York based GSW is the consummate touring band and revel in the art of the long set. Just bubbling with major label potential, GSW is nothing short of a blast in concert.

The key word here is "jam." GSW's tunes are a marriage of extended Deadlike riffs and grooves with occasional outbreaks of white-bread rap. It's a joyful rhythm - good clean fun.

The type of performance featured on the band's recent release of live tracks, Who's Driving?, has earned them a loyal following, the God Street Whinos, and spurned a monthly newsletter. The Whinos will be in full force and warmed up by recently crowned Battle of the Bands champions, yel'l.

Friday - Peter Wolf
7 p.m. Tickets $10 in advance, $12 at the door, 21+

The '80s throwback is in full-effect. For many (especially those raised in or near Boston), the early '80s means the J. Geils Band. "Piss on the Wall", "Freeze Frame", "Centerfold" — these were all musical staples of young Generation Xers. The front character, the master of disaster of the J. Geils Band was the charismatic and energetic Peter Wolf.

Now at work on his fourth solo album since Geils dissolved in 1983, Wolf is touring with far more energy than a man flirting with 40 should own.

Weened on R&B and blues, Wolf's music takes elements of both forms and an even stronger dose of rock and roll for a raging performance. He calls it a "Houseparty Evening."

Saturday - Bad Brains
8 p.m. Tickets $10 in advance, $12 at the door, 18+

A clever mix of hard rock, reggae, rap and assorted other styles is the Brains. On stage, the Brains uphold their standards of musical energy with a rasta influence.

Rise is Bad Brains' latest and first major release and it's been well received. The Brains have continued with their frenetic pace while not abandoning their roots. New "throat" man Israel Joseph-I fills the shoes of a long line of previous frontmen more than adequately.

Stomp Box opens the show.

The final HSCN reviews

By MARTIN BROWN
Collegian Staff

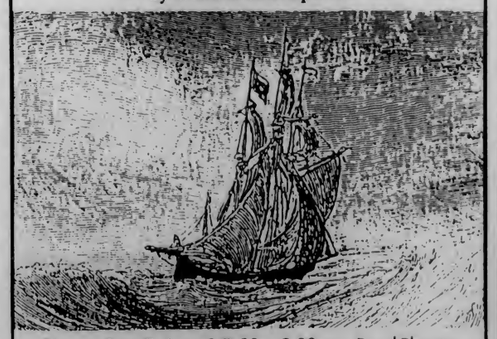
This is the last of this semester's Housing Services Cable Network Reviews so enjoy. I'm going to recommend two movies from the batch on HSCN and one you should rent on your own if you want too. The two movies on HSCN are The Bridge on the River Kwai and The Conversation, and the one you should rent is Stripes. Bill Murray plays a drifter who decides to clean up his act and join the Army, though finds that he hates it. There are many classic scenes in the movie, but my favorite is when after he decides to join, he parks his car on the side of the road. Somebody yells, "You can't park that car here!" which Murray retorts with, "I'm not parking it here, I'm abandoning it."

HSCN Reviews

The Addams Family — This movie has great performances (Anjelica Houston was made to play Morticia), but no plot. I won't even bother to try and explain the story. Basically, just sit down, relax and enjoy. My favorite scene in the movie is when Wednesday and Pugsley act out a swordfight for a talent contest. Raul Julia and Christopher Lloyd fill out the rest of the roles. The movie is hit or miss, but overall rather fun. B

Blame it on Rio — I think this movie is for everybody who is completely burned out or sexually repressed. This sex comedy stars Michael Caine as a married man going through a mid-life crisis. He and his friend and their two daughters decide to go to Rio for vacation. Trouble ensues when the friend's daughter falls for him. The movie is not really that good, but at this point in the semester, some brainless fun might be nice. Enjoy. C+

The Bridge on the River Kwai — For an older war movie, this one isn't half bad. Alec Guiness (Obi Wan from Star Wars) plays a British Commander whose regiment is in a Japanese prison camp. They are forced to build a bridge under some harsh conditions. The movie is rather long (almost 3 hours), but overall quite enjoyable, with an ending that is surprising in a bizarre way. Check it out if you have the time. A-



The Conversation — Gene Hackman proves he is one outstandingly diverse actor with his performance as an expert wire tapper trying to figure out what a conversation he recorded means. The movie was written and directed by Francis Ford Coppola back when he was doing his best work. This is a fascinating look at what it takes to be the best.A

Danton — This is a hard movie to review. It's a two and a half hour French film (with subtitles) on a subject that really doesn't interest me (The Reign of Terror in France). I'm still going to give it a decent grade though due to the strong performance by Gerard Depardieu. He plays the title role, a revolutionary who wants to end the madness. It's such a gusto performance that he carries the movie on his back. At times hard to follow, decide for yourself. B-

The Dresser — I'm going to strongly recommend the first 20 minutes of The Dresser, and if you enjoy that watch the rest. If not, turn it off. The best scene in the movie happens within the first 15 minutes at a train station. Basically, the movie is about an aged major British actor (Albert Finney) and his dresser (Tom Courtenay) and their relationship during World War II. Excellent performances by both leads made the movie enjoyable, but the story at times is a bit tedious. If you're an upcoming actor, this movie is a must see. B

Movies on HSCN this week not reviewed: Hero, Hot Shots I, Jack the Bear, Loaded Weapon I, The Pope Must Diet, The Sandlot, The Diary of Sigmund Freud, Once Upon a Forest, and The French Connection.

Wayward, random plot turns Pericles to sleeper

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

Pericles
Rand Theatre
Dec. 2, 1993

In a scene from Michael Tritto's new production of Pericles, the once-youthful Prince of Tyre is revealed as an old man, outfitted with a grey mane that looks like a trick-or-treater's fright wig.

When this scene was unveiled, on the night I attended, the audience reaction was varied. Someone laughed. Someone yawned. Someone, deep in the Rand Theatre, gasped as if the scene held emotional meaning for them. I did not know how to react. By this point in the fifth act, I was too weary from wondering what the value of the story was, what the director's intentions were, or why I had stayed past intermission.

Let me clear up one thing right away: I have never lost myself in Shakespeare. I don't get choked up when MacBeth sees a dagger. I don't wipe away tears of helpless laughter when Bottom starts to bray. But even if I were the Bard's personal press agent, I could not defend this snore-mongering theatrical abortion.

Pericles is the story of a youthful prince (Michael Lombardi) who woos incestuous princesses, fights before strange kings, finds love, loses love, goes swimming and cuts his hair.

It is also the story of his daughter Marina (Megan McEnulty) who escapes killers, is captured by pirates, becomes a prostitute, falls in love and goes home to daddy.

If the plot were just a little more wayward, random, or nonsensical, a creative critic could argue that Shakespeare was reflecting the uncertainty of life, or the lack of meaning in world society. As the matter rests, this just seems like a bad play.

No one is more aware of the text's shortcomings than director Michael Tritto, who makes a valiant effort to disguise them. Tritto, who presented last semester's Cloud Nine with such insight and economy of expression, is here trying to lose his play in eye-grabbing jungles of hanging parachutes (designed by Terry Beckett) and relentlessly fast pacing. So flashy and fast is the show, in fact, that one seems sure it is working towards one hell of a finale. But even in this, Shakespeare fails.

If there is a reason for seeing this production, it is to observe the development of two fine young actors as they hold together this mess of melodramatic stir-fry.

Michael Lombardi is a long-time supporting player, who gets his first starring role as the evening's eponymous hero. Lombardi is a talented performer, who evokes Pericles' whimsies and passions with the theatrical excess suitable for this type of show. Better still is Megan McEnulty, the bawdy and raunchy Phoebe from As You Like It, who is here a model of virtue and strength as Marina.

McEnulty is growing into a wonderful classical actress, whose voice does a soft-shoe routine through the obstacle course of dramatic poetry. It is McEnulty's performance which I will remember from this production, while the other details I will force from memory. This lump of princely pyrite is best sealed in the vault that I reserve for failed efforts from people who should have known better.

Brubeck to play at F.A.C.

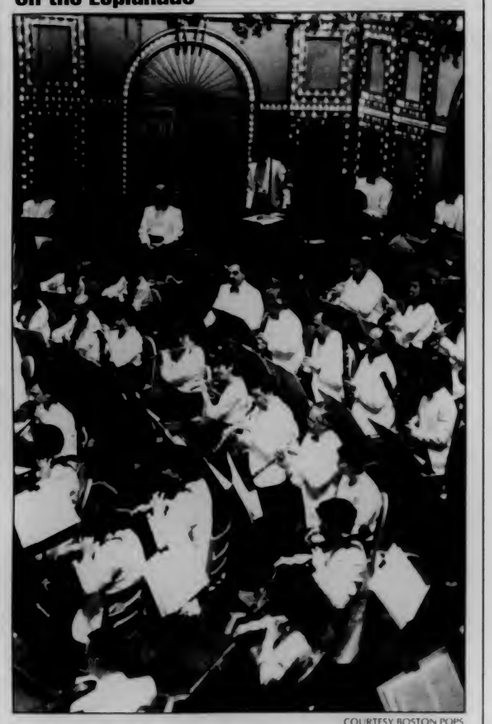
By CHRISTINA ORWICZ
Collegian Staff

One of the innovators of what is known as "West Coast cool" jazz, Dave Brubeck, will appear at the Fine Arts Center this Sunday, Dec. 12, at 7 p.m. This special concert will benefit the Fidelco Dog Foundation, based in Bloomfield, Conn.

With a career spanning over 40 years, Brubeck had his 73rd birthday this past Monday. Having begun in the 1940s and 1950s to develop the "cool" sound, Brubeck has played with jazz greats as Charlie Parker, Stan Getz and Dizzy Gillespie, as well as having recorded with artists such as Carmen McRae. Also, Brubeck has toured extensively during his career, even going to the former U.S.S.R. in 1987.

The Dave Brubeck Quartet, comprised of Joe Morello, Eugene Wright and Paul Desmond, was the first jazz group to ever receive a gold record for Time Out, which they recorded in 1959.

Reunited for this special event, Brubeck, on piano, Wright, on bass, and Morello, on drums, will be joined by guest artists Robert Mitello and Larry Coryell.



Having collaborated with Brubeck on his latest album, Quiet as the Moon, Mitello, on alto saxophone, has recorded with musicians such as Chuck Mangione.

Coryell, like Brubeck, is acknowledged as a pioneer of his own right. Developing the jazz-rock fusion movement with his guitar work, he has been noted as a "true renaissance musician." Also, Coryell has performed with legends like Miles Davis and Stephane Grappelli.

The Fidelco Foundation, to whom concert benefits will go, is New England's only guide dog school and is a non-profit, private organization. This benefit concert will help place more dogs with men and women across the Northeast.

Sunday night should prove to be a historical, as well as a swingin', moment in the life of jazz.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Your creative flair brings in new profits. Enjoy all the attention you are drawing. Romance takes a temporary backseat to your career interests.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Worthy efforts come to your attention from all directions. The key to business success in choosing the right partner. Heed the advice of an older person who has your best interests at heart.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Creative endeavors and affairs of the heart generate excitement now. Seek the aid of someone influential in promoting an innovative idea. Be cautious.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): A new career or personal initiative will help you attain your long-term goals. Read the small print before signing contracts. Following up a hunch could produce extra cash. Relax at home tonight.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Unexpected news or events may shake you. Someone wants to debate a stormy issue. Think before speaking, you need to see all sides. An elusive agreement can still be clinched. A friend babysits.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Creative thinking puts a project over the top. A romantic dialogue lets you and mate make a fresh beginning. You are all heart and hot shoes. A positive attitude produces greater domestic happiness.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Secrecy is recommended when handling sensitive matters. Original ideas should be discussed only with those directly involved in putting them into operation.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): The spotlight is on your career and prestige. Your hopes are high ... and for good reason. Loved ones go out of their way to make you happy. Romance becomes more fulfilling.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Share some great news. You are happiest when you can talk things over with your mate and children. Steer a course for financial independence by becoming a savvy business person. Renew old ties.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): The holidays are quickly approaching and will make you feel festive. When watching television, take time to notice the Tonto's instead of the Lone Ranger's.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Play your hunches when it comes to money. Listen politely to a friend's well-intentioned advice, but stick to the guidance of experts. Changes at place of employment give you new options.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A new assignment could bring surprisingly large financial benefits. Good timing is the key to gaining influential person's backing. A sibling is anxious to get in touch with you.

in the land by scoring a couple of TD's and picking off a couple of passes in his final game wearing the blue and gold.

Regardless of what the pollsters say, the Irish deserve consideration for the mythical national championship if Florida State defeats Nebraska and Florida beats West Virginia. They are the only ones to defeat the 'Noles and proved on the field they are the better team. Period.

Holtz will run up the score if given the chance, trying to improve his team's standing. ND 51-13.

APG: Perhaps the two most overrated teams in the land. Sorry Sean, no use in crying over spilt milk or David Gordon last second field goals. Every year the Aggies disappoint in the bowls, this year no different. Jeff Burris is a top ten pick in the draft, not even close to the best in the country. Alabama's Antonio Langham is a better defensive back, and there are a ton of better runners.

Is the fact that Holtz will run up the score on A&M actually admirable? Of course not, I just wish that whining fool and ND had the chance to play FSU on a neutral field. Anyway, in a game that means nothing, ND 43-10.

Blindsided will be momentarily interrupted while the two of us engage in a brawl.

Sugar Bowl: Florida vs. West Virginia

APG: The Gators are just so explosive; now that Terry Dean knows he will play the whole game at QB, watch out for him hitting wideouts Willie and Jack Jackson. Errict Rhett is one tremendous runner, Coach Steve Spurrier won't have to worry about the Mountaineers defense.

All the senseless talk of West Virginia for #1 will end, they can't possibly compete with Florida's speed. Please, Don Nehlen, stop complaining and next year schedule somebody. Actually why should he. Play only three road games, no tough out of conference games, and find yourself in a major bowl game claiming national championship consideration. Talent and strength of schedule are where it's at. The night of blowouts continues. Florida 34-16.

SPH: They should call this the Apathy Bowl, because I don't give a damn who wins this one. All I want to know, Anthony, is why we didn't receive a little yellow postcard from the West Virginia athletic department begging us to give their Mountaineers a chance. They obviously don't respect us or our readership. That slight alone gives the Gators a touchdown advantage. Florida 24-16.

Orange Bowl: Nebraska vs. Florida State

SPH: The absolute stupidity of the people who vote in the polls is displayed by the early 21-point spread in this one. No way this is a national championship matchup with a spread like that.

Heisman shoo-in Charlie Ward will lead his explosive Seminole offense past the too-slow Cornhusker D. I said early in the season this was Tom Osborne's year, but he's only got four players who could play with FSU. Trev Alberts is as good a linebacker in the country, better than Derrick Brooks I think.

The Cornhuskers will be able to score on FSU, with the likes of QB Tommie Frazier, halfback Calvin Jones and wide-out Calvin Muhammad.

Unfortunately, regrettably and undeservedly, the Seminoles will be celebrating their national championship come midnight. FSU 39-23.

APG: Not the ideal national championship game, however FSU Coach Bobby Bowden and his not-too-bright Seminoles can keep Nebraska in the game. Osborne's teams don't have the killer instinct and won't capitalize on the 'Noles blunders. It remains to be seen whether the Cornhuskers can run on FSU and I doubt Frazier can pass on that secondary.

To win, Nebraska can't turn it over, and Frazier has to do everything perfectly on the ground and in the air. It's time for Brooks and wideouts Kez McCorvey, Kevin Knox, and Tamarick Vanover to show their stuff. Those players do a lot of talking and they won't let us forget when they win the title. FSU's schedule was one of the toughest in recent history, they escaped with only one loss and had this game gift wrapped for them. Florida State pours it on late. FSU 42-24.

Our final dream: FSU vs. Notre Dame at Warren McGuirk Stadium. No crowd, no media, winner is Blindsided National Champion.

It's been a fun year, thanks for reading, Happy Holidays, and we aren't responsible for those who lose their shopping money for foolishly banking on our picks.

hold names come April:

- Bob Kudelski, Ottawa. Who thought he would be in the top 15 in scoring at this point?
- Adam Graves, Rangers. Mike Keenan told The Hockey News that Graves was the best winger he's ever coached. The scrappy Graves is on a pace for 60 goals, many of which are shorthanded.
- Jeff Norton, San Jose. Exiled Islander providing leadership and stability to improved blueline corps.
- Keith Tkachuk, Winnipeg. Cam Neely-type player is the youngest captain in Jets history. Has 40 goals written all over him.
- Doug Weight, Edmonton. Bright spot in an otherwise lost season for Oilers. The former Lake Superior State star is an excellent two-way player

And for some peerless predictions for the second half of the season:

Montreal will settle itself into a playoff position and then ambush someone in the playoffs. Buffalo will sneak into the playoffs at the expense of Quebec.

The Rangers will run away with the league title while New Jersey and Philadelphia falter down the stretch.

Toronto, Detroit and Chicago roll while Dallas and St. Louis get rolled over.

Los Angeles will miss the playoffs as the Central Division sends all six of its teams to the postseason.

Minutewomen try to go over .500 against UNH

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team attempts to raise its record above sea level for the first time in two years tonight when it takes on the University of New Hampshire.

The last time the Minutewomen had a winning record at any point in a season was during the 1991-92 season when they started out 2-1 with early season victories over St. Francis (PA) and Cornell. Massachusetts finished that season, the first under Coach Joanie O'Brien, with a 4-24 record.

The Minutewomen find themselves at the 1-1 mark after an opening game loss against Ohio State and last week's win against Northeastern heading into tonight's contest.

Last year, Massachusetts made the trip to Durham, N.H., and was buried by the Wildcats 71-49 in a game that saw a 25-6 first half run by the Wildcats and early foul trouble for the Minutewomen.

"They were just too much to handle," O'Brien said. "We dug ourselves a hole early that we couldn't get out of. We had a very uninspired effort and we were on our heels the whole way."

The Wildcats, out of the North Atlantic Conference and winner of the Cornell/Sheraton Classic, sport a 2-1 record and are led by Marcie Lane and Pam Brandell. Lane leads the team in scoring, with a 12.3 per game average, while Brandell averages eight points and a team-high 9.3 rebounds per contest.

The Minutewomen are led by the sophomore tandem of Octavia Thomas and Melissa Gurile.

Gurile leads the team in scoring at 21.5 per game and is second in rebounding with seven boards a game. Gurile's coming off a 21-point, seven-rebound performance in last Wednesday's Northeastern game, a 56-44 Massachusetts victory.

Thomas had a monster first game against Ohio State, pumping in 31 points and snagging 14 rebounds while being guarded by All-American Katie Smith. Thomas checks into the UNH contest with per game averages of 20.5 points and 11.5 rebounds.

The Minutewoman backcourt will receive a lift with the full-time return of sophomore point guard Tricia Hopson, who has been hampered with an ankle injury. Hopson will likely take over point duties from freshman Beth Kuzmeski, who is averaging 12.0 points per game.

STEVE PEDULLA / COLLEGIAN

University of Massachusetts forward Octavia Thomas and the rest of the Minutewomen hope to go to 2-1 for the season when they host the University of New Hampshire tonight at Curry Hicks Cage. Tip-off is at 7 p.m.

Season-ending knee injury hits Hawks Blunt-ly

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

The Atlantic 10 Conference lost one of its best players last Wednesday when St. Joseph's senior Bernard Blunt broke his knee cap in a 93-73 loss at No. 14 Arizona.

A First Team All A-10 player last season, Blunt underwent successful surgery Friday and will miss the rest of the Hawks' 1993-94 campaign. The 6-foot-3 guard averaged 18 points per game, pulled down 5.7 rebounds a game and tallied 60 assists while leading St. Joe's to an 18-11 record overall and a second place finish in the league.

Blunt was picked by the coaches to reach First Team All-Conference for the third-straight year in the preseason.

Blunt's injury was not the first casualty for a Hawks squad that was expected by many to challenge the upper echelon of the A-10. In October, junior forward Bernard Jones fell down a flight of stairs and blew out his left knee, an injury that finished his season before it even started. Jones, who is redshirting this season because of the injury, scored 11.6 points per game for the Hawks.

In its first game without Blunt, St. Joe's beat Loyola (Md.) by 20 points; however, when the competition intensifies against teams with strong two-guards, the Hawks may have trouble. Their next contest is home at Hawk Hill against Pennsylvania and the Quakers' highly-touted backcourt of juniors Matt Maloney and Jerome Allen.

• Last Friday, No. 24 George Washington went head to head with No. 2 North Carolina in the Tournament of Champions, but could not pull out a victory against Coach Dean Smith's Tar Heels, falling 87-62. The Colonials were trying to repeat the upset performance of A-10 rival and No. 8 Massachusetts, who handed Carolina its only loss of the season, a 91-86 overtime setback in the Pre-Season NIT.

The marquee match-up was at the center position, where GW's Yinka Dare and UNC's Eric Montross held center-stage. Dare won the battle in points, outscoring the Tar Heel 12-9; however, it was Carolina forward Jerry Stackhouse and guard Dante Calabria who stole the show, pacing the Tar Heel offense to the victory.

• This week was the second straight that the A-10 had two teams ranked in both Top 10s, the Associated Press and the CNN/USA Today polls. Temple sits at No. 5 in AP and No. 3 in the CNN poll. Massachusetts is at Nos. 8 and 9, respectively in each.

• A-10 squads don't take a break over the intersession, as the strength of schedule and quality of opponents increases, starting this weekend.

Temple, West Virginia and St. Bonaventure take the court against Big East members Villanova, Pittsburgh and Seton Hall, respectively.

UMass stands atop the league standings with a 1-0 record along with Rhode Island, who lost to Brown in its season opener 82-78. The Bonnies are the only other ones to have played in conference, losing to both the Minutemen and URI.

• Massachusetts forward Lou Roe was named A-10 Player of the Week for the second consecutive week. Roe is leading the league in scoring, averaging 22.2 points per game.

Blindsiders face off on Bowl matchups

Not that any of you will remember this come New Year's Day, but with the bowl matchups all set, we figured it was time to get together and present you, the reader, with our Blindsided Bowl Bonanza

Fiesta Bowl: Arizona vs. Miami

Anthony P. Guido: i've been on the Wildcat bandwagon, Miami Coach Dennis Erickson can't find a quarterback, this spells trouble down in Tempe. The 'Cats defense will win it in its backyard, with QB Danny White running a conservative offense. Arizona 17-14.

BLINDSIDED Guido and Hayden on College Football

Sean P. Hayden: Sorry, Anthony, but it's not a conservative offense Arizona runs — it's a backwards offense. Chuck Levy is going to get nowhere against the Miami D. Home field means nothing here. Miami 33-10.

Carquest Bowl: Boston College vs. Virginia

SPH: The word just rolls right off the tongue ... Carquest.

BC's hot right now. if not for bad play calling in the last two minutes of the West Virginia game, we'd be previewing the Eagles in the Cotton. It's Glenn Foley's last chance to shine and prove he's an NFLer. BC 48-27.

APG: I hate to agree with you, but BC is hot and Foley will go out strong. What in the world is Virginia, at 7-4, not even in the top 25, doing in a New Year's Day bowl. As if you needed another reason to hate the bowl coalition. BC 27-6.

Rose Bowl: UCLA vs. Wisconsin

APG: Could be the closest game of the day, the Badgers are riding an emotional high. Coach Barry Alvarez has done an unbelieveble job, he's the better coach and he's got Brent Moss to run over the Bruins. Wisconsin 23-21.

SPH: You're right, Anthony. Alvarez is the better coach, but I heard he offered to give up all his home games next year and play them in Peru.

Wisconsin couldn't stop Joey Galloway of Ohio State and they won't stop J.J. Stokes. Best game of the day. UCLA 22-20.

Cotton Bowl: Texas A&M vs. Notre Dame

SPH: No surprise who I'm going to pick here. Bryant Young and Jim Flanigan are going to pound Aggie QB Cory Pullig. Jeff Burris will prove he is the best college football player

The evils of expansion

It seems to me that the expansion teams (Florida, Anaheim, Tampa, Ottawa, and San Jose) are getting far more credit than they deserve. While most are placing emphasis on heady drafting and hard work as a reason for the success of expansion teams, the real reason is that for three straight seasons, expansion teams have stripped the Original 21 of the depth they once enjoyed.

BETWEEN THE PIPES Mike DiLorenzo on the NHL

Without much foresight, the NHL has added these five teams in only three years. While the addition of San Jose in 1991 did not noticeably downgrade the level of play, the subsequent addition of four more teams has.

Unlike the NBA or NFL, when an NHL team drafts a player, it is understood that the player may not even be on the team, let alone have an impact, for at least a couple of years. Of course, there are always players who make an immediate impact, but this is the exception: the NHL considers a draft deep if it has only 7-10 blue-chip prospects.

Consequently, because the established teams have lost maybe six or seven players to expansion, and haven't had time to sufficiently replenish their depth through the draft, the overall talent level in the league has dropped considerably the last three years. Therefore, the fact that expansion teams have won games this year in Calgary, Montreal, and New York City should not be too surprising.

No, I am not forgetting the poor aggregate record of the expansion teams (43-78-15). However, years ago, it would have been unthinkable to have an expansion team beat the league's elite, let alone do it on the road. Consider that if the season ended today, San Jose would be in the playoffs and Florida would be only three points from a playoff berth.

The Original 21 have been forced for three straight years to expose some of their players; by the end of the third year, they were forced to expose players who have impact potential. How else can one explain the Panthers getting John Vanbiesbrouck, a former Vezina Trophy winner? Simply put, if the Beezer is the 10th best goalie to be exposed, he would be drafted in the third expansion year (the top nine will have gone to San Jose, Ottawa, and Tampa, who each selected three). The proof in the pudding is that Vanbiesbrouck was taken first overall in this year's expansion draft. If you are the Rangers, you don't replace a goalie of that caliber easily.

And it's only going to get worse as the NHL plans to add two more teams by the turn-of-the-century.

Housing shortfall forces hiring freeze

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

A hiring freeze and a postponement of several capital projects will be the result of a $849,000 deficit in the housing services division at the University of Massachusetts.

This past year, housing services had a budget of $25 million. It was expected that a portion of this money would come from student's occupancy in the dormitories. This budget was based on students' enrollment and reservations made on the rooms last semester.

Both sophomores and first-year students are compelled to live on campus. The housing average cost this year was $2,116.

Housing services expected 10,500 students to live in the campus dormitories. 10,000 students are presently living in UMass housing now.

This shortage has caused housing services a deficit of exactly $849,206, according to University of Massachusetts spokeswoman Karin Sherbin.

"There was a $849,206 revenue for the 1993-94 fiscal year, which put about a 3 percent deficit on the budget. This is a very small amount of money to be absorbed," Sherbin said.

The deficit will be assimilated by a hiring freeze. Hiring for positions which are considered non-critical will be put on halt. This will be done to avoid laying off current employees.

The hiring freeze does not include any other schools from the five-campus UMass system.

Another result of the deficit will be a suspension on individual projects on campus. Plans for replacing things such as an old boiler will be set aside.

This shortage has caused housing services a deficit of exactly $849,206, according to spokeswoman Karin Sherbin.

There will also be a suspension on infrastructure building on campus.

Many students reserved their room in the beginning of the semester and decided not to live there at the last minute. Housing services planned their budget around the amount of students who reserved a room. The deficit arose when the rooms were not filled and no money was received.

Officials of housing services have been discussing whether or not they should have a deposit charge for students who reserve a room.

Housing Director, Chika Nnamani, told Sherbin no decision has been made on this issue thus far. Nothing will be done for the spring semester.

Women add water polo, crew as teams

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Staff

Pending approval from the Board of Trustees, the University of Massachusetts will be adding women's water polo and crew as varsity programs along with adding funds for scholarships for the already existing women's sports within the next five years. University officials targeted full compliance under Title IX in the five-year timespan.

Under the proposal, scholarship aid for new and existing women's sports for the 1994-95 academic year will be increased to $500,000 making the total funds approximately $1.6 million a year. The cost of the two additional sports is expected to cost no more that $374,000, with the majority of funds going to women's crew due to higher cost of equipment.

The University has reinstated volleyball, tennis, and lacrosse this past year due to an out-of-court agreement with female student athletes.

"Title IX is a huge issue in college athletics — more and more women athletes are bringing lawsuits," said Carol Barr, a UMass sport management doctoral candidate who served as a Title IX consultant and conducted a study to help in the proposal for the athletic department.

"It is not the intent to raise women's teams and cut the men," said Barr. "Adding programs for both is the true intention."

The addition of the programs are in compliance with Title IX gender equity rules, a law passed by Congress barring discrimination of gender in public universities and to require an equal number of men's and women's teams. Currently the University has 15 women's teams and 14 for the men.

"By taking these steps, the University will be a leader in providing equal opportunity to women students on the athletic field," said Chancellor David Scott.

Title IX requires that the ratio of male/female

SGA to fund Farrakhan speech

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

After nearly three and a half hours of debate, the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association voted to grant the Black Student Union $2,000 in order to bring highly controversial Minister Louis Farrakhan to speak at UMass in March.

Farrakhan, a "messenger of the Nation of Islam," is believed by some people to be against Christians, Jews and homosexuals. He has been quoted as saying white people are the "skunk of the planet earth," and as saying he will "grind them [the Jews] and crush them into little bits."

In making his proposal to receive a grant from the SGA to bring Farrakhan to campus, however, Black Student Union President Shomwa Shamapande urged the senators to look past the "propaganda" and to recognize the importance of bringing speakers with alternative viewpoints to UMass.

"[Multiculturalism] can not be achieved by catering to popular opinion or mainstream views," Shamapande said. "In order for us to have multiculturaiism we need to embrace a variety of views of culture, and we need to hear the views of conservatives and liberals. Farrakhan's quotes have been taken out of context, let's not censor his views."

One of the arguments made against bringing Farrakhan to campus is that, in a time of financial crisis, the SGA should not be granting money to bring a

Hannukah away from home

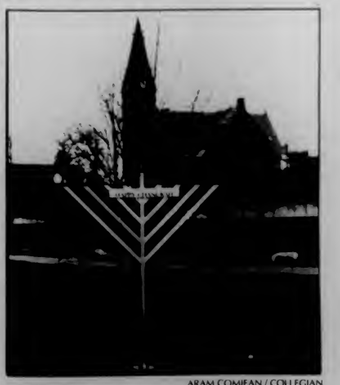
By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

While students are finishing up their last assignments and preparing for finals, candles are being lit around campus to celebrate the Jewish holiday — Hannukah.

This "Festival of Lights" holiday has been buried amongst finals this year, preventing many students who are Jewish and celebrate the holiday, a chance to be with their families.

Just like Christmas, Hannukah is a chance for families to gather and celebrate the season. It is the season of closeness, the season of giving and the celebration of a historical, religious story.

Hannukah is the eight-day festival celebration of the remembrance of a miracle. In 165 B.C., Judah the Maccabee and his small army fought a victorious war against the Syrians.



After the Syrians desecrated their tempie, the Jews went in to clean the holy synagogue.

Their main concern was to light the Menorah, which is a candelabra, to make sure there was eternal light over the Ark.

In the tempie, only one cruse of oil was found which was enough to light one night.

Yet with the help of a miracle, the oil burned for eight nights. It was said that the victory constituted for the miracle.

Media blitz spreads the word

State and celebrities team up to help abuse victims

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state on Wednesday kicked off a media blitz to tell physically and emotionally abused women where to turn for help.

"The most important thing to do is continue to get the word out," WBZ-TV anchorwoman Liz Walker said.

"There are still victims and they are still suffering and they are still dying," Walker said.

Commissioned by the Massachusetts Coalition for Battered Women Service Groups, the campaign consists of television and radio spots, billboards, subway signs and newspaper ads urging women to seek help if they are abused.

"If you're abused, call 4-1-1 for the nearest battered women's program," the narrator says in the television ad.

New England Telephone agreed to allow its 4-1-1 directory assistance operators to help callers by putting them in contact with the nearest battered women's program.

"It's far too often that a woman doesn't know who to call," said Carolyn Ramsey, executive director of the coalition.

Joanna Kerns, formerly of the television show "Growing Pains" and star of a television movie about a battered wife, "Shameful Secrets," lended her hand to the Massachusetts program.

"For so many women, real terror is not walking down a city street at night," Kerns said. "Real terror is spending time at home alone with someone they love."

Kerns said she was alerted to the problem when a friend tried to leave an abusive husband. Kerns and her friend tried to find a place for her to stay and get help, "and we came up empty."

The woman eventually moved away from her husband, Kerns said: "She was lucky."

The coalition will distribute placards to retailers and offices reading "How Would You Like To Feel This Safe All the Time?" to be posted in restrooms, "where women feel they can feel safe from their batterers."

Also, facets of the campaign will be translated into Spanish, Portuguese, Chinese and Haitian Creole.

students be proportional to the ratio of male/female undergraduates. Currently the University enrollment is 52/48 percent male to female and the expected athlete ratio is 54.8 percent male to 45.2 percent female.

Women's crew has been successful as a club sport, currently holding the titles of New England Champions and Division II national champions. This season they have defeated a majority of division two schools and have their racing season in the spring.

"There has been a strong tradition of women's athletics here at UMass," said Rick Kelliher, the coach of women's crew. "I think that women's crew will fit in perfectly."

"I think this is a great method of meeting gender equality guidelines," said Russ Yarworth, the coach for men's water polo.

According to Yarworth, women's water polo differs in ball size and a shorter pool. The team will probably play in the East Coast League against schools like Harvard, Princeton and Slippery Rock. There are approximately 18 eastern schools with a women's water polo team or club.

"We have selected two sports we can be competitive in and such sports like women's crew have demonstrated that they can be successful," said Robert Marcum, director of athletics.

Local News

News from this "U"

compiled by Dan Wetzel

"News from other 'U's'" has been coming out for two years now and while my research interns and I enjoy reporting on the bizarre news from other college campuses, we have come to realize that few places can compare with the ridiculous stories generated from dear old UMass. Thus today we present, "News from this U."

Throw the book at him

While UMass' list of powerful alumni is a little slim, there was a time when the school expelled a student who any college in the nation would be proud to have as an alum. His name was Harland Fiske Stone, and he attended Massachusetts Agricultural College (now UMass) during the late 1800s.

Stone had a number of minor run-ins with the strict discipline code of the school and it came to a boil during the school's weekly mandatory religious service in the Old Chapel. The tradition at the end of the service was for each class, in descending order of seniority (seniors, then juniors, then sophomores, etc.), to quietly file out of the Old Chapel.

But tradition also held that once a semester, one class would attempt to break rank, and the entire group would crash the exit and attempt to beat the class in front of them out the door. This was called "Rush."

Stone was a sophomore and he led his class on the annual rush. But as they charged the door, a professor grabbed Stone and held him back. Enraged that the rush would fail (which would have been embarrassing), Stone slugged the old instructor in the face. He was expelled.

Stone transferred to Amherst College, where he met another young scholar named Calvin Coolidge. After graduation Stone went on to Columbia Law School and a career in law. Coolidge became mayor of Northampton, governor of Massachusetts and eventually President of the United States.

When President Coolidge needed to fill a vacancy on the Supreme Court he appointed Harland Fiske Stone, the Amherst College alum, as Chief Justice.

Cannabis Reform?

During the later 1970s all members of Student Government were able to use state cars for official use. This practice was widely abused and finally ended when one Senator went a little too far — Mexico to be precise.

The senator had signed a car out two weeks before and hadn't been seen since. But one night he called the SGA president and told him he was in a New Mexican desert where the car had broken down. But driving to New Mexico was the least of his problems because the car just happened to contain a trunk load of marijuana, which he had just smuggled in from Mexico and was planning on bringing to UMass, in the state car. The proper arrests were eventually made. .

Whitless degree

While on an assignment last year, I met a reporter from USA Today who insisted I tell his UMass story.

The man came to UMass in the late 1970s, when UMass was truly ZooMass. He fit in well with the party image, rarely going to class and earning a solid 1.2 GPA going into the spring of his sophomore year.

That semester he did nothing. No classes, no homework, nothing. By mid-semester he dropped out, realizing he needed to learn some discipline before he returned to campus. A year as a painter got him motivated and the following summer he returned to campus to find out if he could make up the classes he withdrew from.

Of course the bureaucratic run-around was endless and he made so many trip into the registrar's office that summer that a women there grew sick of him. Misunderstanding what he wanted (he just wanted to re-enroll) she said, "If you get out of here now, I'll take care of it. Don't worry."

He went home and looked forward to school in September, but two weeks later a package came from UMass. Inside was a diploma with his name on it.

Grant aimed to aid transition from military production

By JUSTIN DOYLE
Collegian Staff

President Clinton announced on Friday that the University of Massachusetts will be one of the recipients of a $12.7 million dollar project to establish a new Engineering Academy in Southern New England.

UMass at Amherst and Lowell, in cooperation with the Universities of Connecticut and Rhode Island, and Central Connecticut State University, as well as United Technologies Corp., IBM and the Raytheon Co., will combine to better provide graduates with the ability to help defense conversions to commercial customer products.

The main agenda of the grant is to help universities educate students so that they have the skills to make the transition from the field of defense manufacturing to the manufacturing of consumer products.

"The focus is shifting from defense to commercial customer products," said Richard Giglio, head of Industrial engineering at UMass. "We are trying to design the curriculum around the changing industry."

The grant will be used to improve the engineering curriculum, with an emphasis on manufacturing and teaching communication skills, according to Corrado Poli, head of mechanical engineering.

"We are going to focus on revising the freshman program and providing manufacture engineering education across the curriculum," said Poli. "There will be an emphasis on teaching communication and teamwork in the different engineering departments."

Giglio and Poli worked along with Joseph Goldstein, the head of engineering, and Keith Carver, who was the acting dean of the school of engineering when the grant was submitted, over the summer on the project.

"We all worked together for five or six weeks putting the project together, working to get it approved," said Giglio.

Another area the program will try to improve is accessibility to the engineering departments. It will encourage more members of minority groups, women and others who may have typically stayed away from engineering due to lack of opportunity.

We want to build stronger ties to high school students and increase interest in engineering," said Goglio. "The grant will help develop summer programs and classes for high school students, minorities, and women.

Education urged for women

By VANESSA AMIN
Collegian Staff

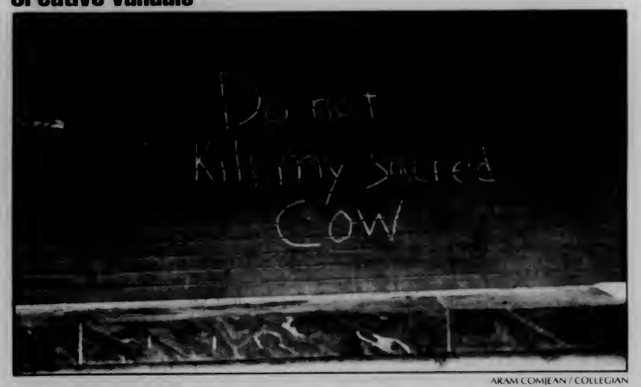
"African women need determination and ambition to achieve educational positions over men," said Meria D. Nowa-Phiri who spoke at noon yesterday, about her graduate work titled, "Factors that Promote and Hinder the Utilization of African Women in Educational Leadership Positions."

This Brown Bag Luncheon lecture gave Nowa-Phiri an opportunity to discuss her dissertation and at the same time gain feedback from the students in the audience.

Nowa-Phiri worked in administration for educational institutions and also taught for about five years. She first decided to do her graduate work on the utilization of African women because she wanted to give something to her community. She gathered most of her data from Africa, mainly in Malawi and Tanzania. Nowa-Phiri interviewed 67 people and 20 of them were women. Most of these people hold educational positions, such as secondary students, principles, and professors. Through observation, photographs, and interviews, Nowa-Phiri gathered not only quantitative but qualitative data.

According to Nowa-Phiri, the factors that enable some African women to succeed in higher educational positions is "inner strength, ambition, and encouragement." Support groups and friends encourages women to keep seeking their goals, Nowa-Phiri said.

There are restraining forces that prevent women from moving up in higher positions, such as one's cultural and tribal values, household duties, family, and the biases of society, Nowa-Phiri said. One may be born in a culture where women should remain at home and the male should be the bread winner. A women, said Nowa-Phiri, has to juggle her career and household chores without jeopardizing her family. The need for change starts with an equal relationship in the household. Men and women should share the duties of the household chores, so women can focus on her career as men do, Nowa-Phiri said.



ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN
Meria D. Nowa-Phiri, a graduate student, stressed the importance of education for women at Wednesday's Brown Bag Lecture series.

"Some men that I interviewed couldn't see a woman in a high position like a principal of a university," Nowa-Phiri said.

According to Nowa-Phiri, a woman may start to feel inferior towards men due to her education at a young age. In elementary schools, the teachers tend to give secondary treatment to girls than boys. The teaching speaker to campus who would only appeal to a select audience.

"If you [the Black Student Union] want it, do it yourself and get him here on campus if you want him," Senator Tom Darby said. "I would be in favor of a loan [to the BSU], but not a grant. Also, unless he said 'just kidding' after everything he has said, I don't see how his quotes can be taken out of context."

Although there were several senators who argued Farrakhan would not do the campus any good because he sponsors hatred and his presence on campus could incite violence, the senate body was eventually overwhelmingly convinced Farrakhan should be allowed to speak because his views should not be censored by the SGA no matter how controversial.

"I don't agree with all of Farrakhan's views," said SGA President David Nunez. "But the only way there is frank and honest discussion of the issues is in the face of controversy."

The total cost of bringing Farrakhan to UMass is $15,000, $5,000 of which will pay for the security Farrakhan will bring with him. He is scheduled to speak at the Fine Arts Center on March 12. All of the proceeds will benefit the New Africa House Library.

Tomorrow? Think today

"Kiss today goodbye." These are the lyrics that chime through my head as I drudged home from the library late the other night. There are more lyrics, but they never chimed through my head. Nope. I never heard more than those three stinging words.

Instead, I was forced to take a deep breath and ask myself, "Why am I really here?" Here, like all of you, quietly slipping unnoticed through the overflowing pipes of UMass. As I walked, I tried to answer these questions.

Alexandria
VESELY

According to Mom and Dad, I'm not going to make any money if I don't go to college. According to my teachers back home, I'm a good student and I'm going to make something out of myself after college. And for reasons I can't remember, I willingly packed my car, (ahem ... my parents' car) and headed down the interstate to UMass.

Now that I'm here, I keep asking myself, "What's next?" And what's after graduation? What happened to those fancy-shmancy brochures and motivating guidance counselors? Or how about those high school teachers, the ones that actually knew you, remember them? They all preached, "Higher education is a chance to explore your avenues and head down your chosen path toward success."

Path? I don't even have a road map. I believe I'm lost (or someone up there lost my path). I've been milling around for months here but I can't seem to figure out where I'm headed. I'm beginning to wonder that if by some freaky happening I land on this yellow brick road, is there going to be some scarecrow to let me know if I'm on the right road?

Every morning I wake up wishing I knew the answers to these questions. Today though, I outdid myself. Today I delved into my ulcerous gut and asked, "Does anyone know the answers to these questions?"

I'm sure there's some kid double-majoring in electrical engineering and biochemistry who is taking one minute, one very timed minute, to briefly look up from his Physics with Photoachometers Just for Fun textbook to skim over this article. I'll bet he has a path, a map, a compass and is cruising down the straightaway in a Porsche 911. That's when I realized something. Every straightaway folds into a turn.

I'm not preaching, "abandon your dreams." Dream all you want and then dream some more, because after all that's what the world was designed for. But there's one thing I realized as I sat around planning the future. When the future finally does arrive, I don't think I'll have the time to notice. Because after all, I'll probably still be sitting at the drafting table perfecting new plans.

It kind of makes you wonder, if you always think tomorrow will be clearer and brighter than today, there's a good chance it will be. Of course, that'll be the same day you slip into your grave and look at what you did with yesterday. So, as for a path, I'm alive, so I must be on one. Am I on the right one? I don't know. Is it headed in the right direction, I can't know. As for now, I'm happy to take all those wasted minutes searching for signs and instructions on how to construct some mastermind blueprint for an unforseeable future, into minutes I can feel today.

This morning when I woke up, I didn't search for any answers. Instead, I peered out my window at the windy December morning and smiled, knowing that today held something in it for me.

Where is Upward Bound?

A semester has passed and I am still waiting for the University to make good on their promise concerning the Upward Bound program. Back in the spring of 1992 the Upward Bound program was sabotaged.

Malkes
GOMES

To this day, questions concerning the misuse of federal funds, missing computer equipment, misuse of data in the 1992 grant proposal for the program and many other questions have gone unanswered, even though former Chancellor Richard O'Brien had promised to look into these things. But why would the University investigate its own sordid dealings?

Today, the many high school students who used this support program have been left like an empty well without water, to dry away without guidance. The University promised $250,000 for each of the next few years to support a mock program until the Upward Bound program could be reapplied for in April of 1995.

A program called Future Scholars of America was implemented this summer to do the job that the 25-year-old Upward Bound program did. In speaking with sources who took part in this program, it was a total fiasco and was poorly organized. I don't know how the University thought that throwing together a program in a few months, and out of guilt I might add, would have been any success, especially since Upward Bound was strongly established.

Now that the summer program is over, I am wondering where the school-year program is. It is not in effect, so where is the money which was put forth last year to support it for the next few years? I have visited the offices where the support program was supposed to reside. Since the summer, no one has been in these offices except to move things out. Both students and parents are starting to ask questions about the program which has ceased to exist.

My advice is to keep asking questions. Visit the Chancellor's Office and enquire about what is going on. I think it is the new chancellor's duty to carry through with what was supposed to be done.

This semester is a demonstration of how the University will pay lip service to an issue to pacify the students for a while and then revert to their old ways. When will they ever learn?

With winter break approaching, I hope the University will take time to review this issue and have some answers for the public when classes resume in January. All of us who were here last school year remember the agreements the Chancellor signed which I believe were legally binding. I sincerely hope some action is going to go into effect.

I also hope the University is making plans well in advance to formulate the new grant proposal for Upward Bound which is due in April of 1995. Let past mistakes become examples to learn from, not quagmires to drown deeper in.

Speaking out against adult ads

Advertisement that promotes adult entertainment should not be published in the Collegian. The editors of the Collegian make the claim that their goal is to expand the marketplace of ideas, not to discriminate or limit it. The editors also claim it would be unfair to censor based on an offensive nature and that, by advertising, the Collegian somehow hopes to empower their readers. They also claim they are in the business of striving to represent truth. And, the truth is, we are adults and adult entertainment is a reality.

Maybe it's part of Collegian editors' reality, but many people don't share that sentiment. The truth of the matter is the main goal of the Collegian is to make money and it's sad they would do this at the expense of women. This is evident in the statement "if we don't do it, someone else will." Not only do statements like this show bad taste, but also poor judgement.

To have their readers believe that nude female dancing is a way for women to express themselves is simply not so. Everyone needs money at times, for lack of opportunity this may dictate women's circumstances. Given all the violence perpetrated against women in our society, entertainment of this nature perpetuates male superiority and reinforces the notion that it's okay to exploit women. This sends a clear message: women's worth is restricted to their body parts.

There is a Wisconsin study that was financed by the National Institute of Mental Health in 1980, published in the New York Times, that shows a direct link between pornography and violence against women. There was also a case tried before the Supreme Court of Canada by Catherine McKinnon that shows the exact same link.

All aspects of advertisement should be considered and decisions should not be made solely on profit motives. When the Collegian presents insensitive ads like this they lend their unwilling support to this kind of behavior, which is a social problem on many college campuses. The Collegian denying responsibility does not clear it from blame. Agreeing to advertise everything is just as bad as censorship because you subject your readers to opinions and value judgments of others, in this case the editors.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

With this being the last edition of Notes from the Campus Center this semester, we'll try to wrap things up all nice and tidy. In deference to the Arts section "Best and Worst" section (read it after this), we'd like to go through an official best and worst of the fall semester 1993.

Best decision: Chancellor David Scott's decision to finally (after two aborted attempts) make the campus smoke-free. Unfortunately, from students in John Adams starting fires to IDIOTS continuing to smoke in the Franklin Dining Commons, enforcement has been a bit lax. With the UMass dorms already resembling a militarized zone, maybe we can take all violators of the smoking policy, line them up against a wall and...

Worst decision: Surprise, surprise: the award goes to Chancellor Scott for his decision to hire the Williamses in two invented crony/hack jobs which will up the budget $185,000.

Suffice it to say we have ridiculed the decision up and down 'till our faces turned red and green, so we decided to write a new version of "Jingle Bells":

"Jingle Bells, Whitmore smells, the chancellor laid an egg, Marcie and Keith are two hacks who almost made us gag."

We'll try not to quit our day job.

Best construction completion: This was a close race, with the three main projects being the Polymer Research Center, the Campus Center repaving and the greenhouse addition up in Central.

Despite the decision to choose the color pink, and despite the decision to put fresh sod down on Dec. 1, the nod here goes to the greenhouse addition.

Without street lights, you can still get mugged outside the Campus Center no matter how wide the path is. As for the Research Center, it won't be done until after we graduate, so who cares?

Michael
MORRISSEY

Best (and highest) tuition: Right here at the University, where we always get our money's worth. We can't wait until we're on senior billing next semester. There's a tendency to laugh at out-of-staters who are paying more than they would to go to North Carolina and Michigan.

Best concourse table: For those who are sick of the photo guy outside the Bluewall and flowerman, the candle guy has given us all a breath of fresh air. Long live candles, and say hi to Mike (the name of the candle guy) the next time you stop by.

Best election promise: The Daily Collegian's own temptress/news editor Tracy Monahan, who said that "I promise to do a better job next semester. Besides, I'm running unopposed."

Worst attempt to make a difference: The people who put inordinate time and effort into changing a certain symbol on campus. Not only did the University look foolish nation-wide, but the protesters had about as much chance of changing the mascot as St. Bonaventure has in beating the team in basketball.

Best political forum that doesn't take itself seriously: Jonathan Bayuk's "Irish Experience" on WMUA Wednesdays from midnight to 3 a.m. Not only does the show play decent music, but also keeps things interesting discussing a range of topics from flag burning to the Bobbitts.

The show gets more callers than many shows on real radio stations, mostly from a large contingent of fraternities and sororities. The chancellor's own daughter even called a few weeks back, and there's usually plenty of fireworks.

Best ending to a column: .

All I ever needed to know I learned outside of classes

It's been one hell of a semester.

When I say that, I refer to the social life. If I were to explain how the academics have been, just rearrange the words, and you have it — one semester of hell. However, I don't want to talk about the schoolwork. I think I'll save all that for my parents during break. That oughta be fun.

Indeed, this was a semester of learning. I learned many things this past fall season, more than I ever could in any class. Just the normal, hectic, everyday life taught me valuable lessons.

Granted I obviously learned some in my classes, but I realize now that I can learn so much more outside the classroom. While I learned how a tidal wave forms, how the Neilsen ratings affect television, and how social problems hinder society, the lessons of everyday life are more important.

I would like to share just some them with you, if that's alright.

I learned that if I do something totally hideous, haggard, despicable and idiotic like the stair incident, it makes people laugh. You should try it sometime.

I learned about an hour ago that if a person is running for the bus screaming to the driver to stop, the driver plays dumb and refuses to stop despite the poor soul whacking his hands up against the side of the bus.

I learned that the people at Whitmore Administration Building are actually pretty nice — since all the money is in for this semester.

Andrew
BRYCE

I learned that there was a University of Massachusetts calendar filled with male models. Obviously, whoever chose the males for this calendar called while I was on the phone with all of my honeys. For next year, if the phone is busy, six me.

I learned that it's tough to keep my eyes open at a 9:05 class when I consistently go to sleep at 3 a.m. It also makes me drool on myself once I fall asleep during the lecture, which is just not good.

I learned that the fourth stall toilet on my floor doesn't flush as well as the others.

I learned how to use a fax machine.

I learned the reason why Ivory soap sells eight bars for such a cheap price is because after one washup, the bar is gone.

I learned that if I'm strapped for money, I can just look between the cracks of the couch in my room. You may scoff, but it bought me a coffee last week.

I learned that if I choose to go outside to play catch with a buddy after drinking, a greyhound dog comes out of nowhere, puts the football in his mouth, and has my buddy and I chase him around the campus trying to get it back. The chase is over when he rips the ball to shreds with his incisors.

I learned that when I prank call someone and urge them to join the UMass Lionel Richie Fan Club, some curious people actually believe me. For the guy who took the information down, give me a call. We'll really start one up.

I learned that the more times I take out money from the ATM, the more my funds diminish. It took me a while, but I think I have caught on.

I learned that it is fun to write editorials about the less-important things, and I hope you have enjoyed them all.

'Fetal Attraction' — explained

On Tuesday, I received a letter via campus mail from a concerned reader regarding my "Virtual Reality" comic strip titled "Fetal Attraction" [Collegian, Dec. 1]. This individual took the time to write a two-page letter stating that she felt her and insulted that I (or anybody for that matter) could joke about something as serious as a fetus.

She stated that the drawing was disturbing to her and that many individuals on this campus view a fetus as a symbol of choice in dealing with abortion, which is not a subject to be joked about.

I would first like to say that I am a micobiology major and my brain is scientifically oriented. To me a picture or drawing of a fetus symbolizes a fetus. I do not associate it with the abortion issue, rather I associate it with... a fetus. Pure and simple. The comic did not, in any way, poke fun at the delicate issue of abortion, it simply was a play on words involving a fetus.

I do, however, apologize for the graphic nature of the drawing which some could have found offensive. Perhaps my scientific background makes me impervious of being repulsed by such images as I am subject to viewing much worse in my daily life, from my labs at the University to my work in various graphically explicit areas during my job at the local hospital back home.

I wish to thank this reader for taking the time to write to me about her dissatisfaction with that particular strip as well as encourage anyone to write to me in regards to "Virtual Reality," and I will endeavor to take into account all views from all sides before submitting further strips.

I would also like to thank all of those for their continued support for "Virtual Reality," my intentions for doing the strip is solely for the purposes of entertainment, and it disheartens me to hear that anguish was caused by something I created.

The secret to my smiles

This morning, as I was walking through the campus center a friend stopped to say hello. After we chatted for a moment he looked at me and told me that I was always smiling, and he wanted to know what made me so happy. Actually, lots of people ask me that, even people who don't even know me.

Stephanie
EISENBERG

I think it's kind of rude but in my own way I take it as quite a compliment. I'd rather walk around like a grinning idiot than walk around with a snarl on my face, like lots of people I see. Anyway because of my friend, I will now share with you some reasons behind my happiness today.

I'm happy today because it's snowing. This makes me happy for three reasons. First of all I can wear my new snow boots, this thrills me because I've been waiting all semester to wear them, and now I have the chance. I'm also happy about the weather because every Wednesday morning I forgo my five minute walk to the campus center and hop in my automobile for no other reason than laziness. The snow gives me an excuse! And finally, because of this inclement weather, I have hope that classes will be cancelled tomorrow.

I'm happy because my roommates have put up with me all semester and not once tried to kill me. I'm thrilled that they have adjusted to my blaring alarm clock and my endless hitting of the snooze button at ungodly hours, the junk piles which sometimes leave us with very little walking space, my monopolizing of the phone, my late night phone calls, my bouts with the water gun, and my sometimes offbeat sense of humor. (I'm also happy that all my stuff hasn't ended up the front lawn as they have threatened many times!)

I'm happy because I have survived another semester at UMass. Actually as much as I criticize this place, I love it here and I'm thrilled that I still have another year and a half to enjoy it.

I'm happy because tonight is the first night of Hanukkah, and I get to celebrate and rejoice with my friends. I'm happy because my parents sent me up two gifts already and both cards said, "There are lots more waiting at home!" I'm also happy because there is a real Christmas tree in my sorority house and I've never slept in a house with a tree before. And I'm delighted that I live in a house where both holidays can peacefully coexist, with everyone enjoying the entire holiday season.

I'm happy because I have some truly wonderful friends here, without which I don't know what I'd do.

I'm happy because I'm getting a new car next semester and while my driving skills have not improved I'll just look better because of the new automobile. I'm also happy because at first no one will know that it is me in my new car, and this gives me a better chance of tracking down and mowing over the kid who hailed me a moron several weeks ago.

But most of all I'm happy because this semester has been a great one. As I stated above I have some incredible friends with whom I've had a lot of fun with. I've had a lot of fun and funny times this semester, and I can't believe it went by so quickly. I'm happy because all in all, I appreciate all I have and really enjoy being me.

So, there you have it folks, the secret to my smiles. I really enjoy being happy and would truly rather smile and snarl. And to all of those people who snarl all of the time, or have that heinous sourpuss look on their faces all the time, it's really unattractive. You people look ugly and miserable, and it's definitely a turn-off to other people. So smile, be happy, appreciate all of the good things in your life before snarling at the bad. Anyway, that's a wrap! Have a wonderful holiday and good luck on finals! (Oh, another thing, I'm thrilled because I have no finals!!) AND SMILE!!!

Collegian can't justify bar ads

Recently, the Collegian Executive Board attempted to pacify readers who are concerned with the proliferation of strip bar ads by hiding behind a narrow interpretation of the first amendment and accepting a naive understanding of choice [Collegian, Nov. 5].

Words like "free speech" and "censorship" have been used without any substantive discussion of what they mean, as if invoking patriotic rhetoric was enough to solve the problem.

The fact is that freedom of speech is often an illusion in a society without equality. The Constitution was not written for women's freedom, but for white male landowners who held the nation's power and have tried to retain that power by calling any attempt to foster equality a violation of their freedom of speech and an act of censorship.

Those who hold the power inevitably have the most rights. Those with the most access to the channels of free speech have the most free speech, and those who hold the power to invoke their "free" speech most successfully have the power to censor opposing ideas and shape a cultural consciousness that keeps women confined to the lowest stratum of society.

Historically, men have had the "right" to define women sexually and intellectually, as passive, masochistic, and incapable of decision making.

These ideas, protected in the name of free speech, have not simply existed for the sake of fair debate. Having been created by the most powerful, they transcend equal debate to become a kind of pseudo-reality in which lies about women are understood as truth.

Freedom of speech is not free and ideas are not harmless. Women are raped because of the IDEA that women enjoy and deserve pain, and are overwhelmingly the strippers, porn "stars" and prostitutes because of the IDEA that women exist for the sexual service of men.

Culture teaches women what they will be valued for and what their options are, limiting their intellectual scope of choice and expression before they even begin to express themselves.

Women are encouraged to exercise their freedom of speech only when they remain within femininity. Women often remain silent because we have been taught that the only good woman is a compliant one or a dead one.

Within this context of limited free speech for women, the Collegian's assertions that strip bars are harmless and that women love to dance naked for money, is a gross misrepresentation of the truth.

That some women "freely choose" to strip fails to take into account the social context within which women "choose" to strip and negates the fact that thousands of women are harmed by this occupation.

According to WHISPER, a group founded by ex-prostitutes, many strippers report being harassed and raped by customers, or having been "grabbed, fondled, or bitten."

"Others report being filmed by employers without their consent, or being yelled at by customers to spread their legs and masturbate.

"For this, the customer will lay down a few dollars which she must pick up off the floor, or customers stuff the bills between her legs and breasts." According to the Collegian, this is freedom.

That some strippers "feel appreciated" when stripping reflects a society which teaches women that their sense of worth and "beauty" must come through the eyes of men; that women often make choices within cultural constraints that keep them dependent on men for their psychological and economic happiness; that women must do things to please men in order to be granted a pat on the head. According to the Collegian, this is freedom.

The Collegian asserts that it simply strives to represent the truth that strip bars exist. However, the Collegian has conveyed a far more accepted truth — that women are walking orifices; that men's "freedom of speech" and their "right" to culturally censor opposing views through deluging the marketplace of ideas are more important to protect than a women's right to truly express herself.

These ads, contrary to what the Collegian believes, are not, on the whole, challenging. In combination with millions of daily images produced by a patriarchal society, they represent the norm, eroticizing women's inequality, reinforcing the cultural acceptance of women as inferior creatures who belong in the kitchen instead of the board room and in the strip bar instead of the oval office.

As faculty and students who view equality as a valid social goal, we demand that the Collegian stop sanctioning women's oppression.

A person's right to free speech must end where another's begins. Only then, can we begin to discuss speech that is truly free.

A violation of church and state

I am a senior at the University and happen to be Catholic. Last year during Hannukah, a menorah was erected on the lawn outside the Student Union. I waited for the rush of opinions to be printed in the Collegian, there were none.

So this year, I decided that my concerns need to be heard. Must the University be reminded that they are owned and operated by the state? And that the state is not allowed to enforce or advocate any one religion?

Clearly, unless the University is willing to put up a Nativity scene or a Christmas tree, then the menorah should be taken down.

I believe that an apology is due to all the students at the University who celebrate Christmas and Hannukah. There is no need for the University to advocate the celebration of any religion.

The fact that the University allowed the menorah to be put up at all is offensive and goes against our constitutionally guaranteed rights.

Prof. founds magazine

African World a first-rate publication

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

Where can you read pieces penned by such people as Dennis Brutus, Ben Okri and Toni Morrison? Or even discuss a publication's articles which cover anything from "Becoming a Feminist" to an interview with Taju AbdulRaheem speaking on the 7th Pan African Congress. Because of the hard work of a University of Massachusetts professor and graduate student, you are able to just that with African World.

Bartholomew Nnaji, a professor of industrial engineering and operations research, is the founding publisher and president of the bi-monthly publication. He briefly served as interim Federal Minister for Science and Technology in Nigeria.

Okey Ndibe, a student in the Mast of Fine Arts writing program, is the editor of African World. A native of Nigeria, Ndibe was formerly an editor of African Commentary, an award-winning publication considered one of the best new magazines in the U.S. in the late 1980's.

The premiere issue, which came out for November and December, dealt with the issue of African-Americans and their role with saving Africa.

"If you ask me if African-Americans can save Africa, I would say no, because African-Americans have their own deep problems," said Ndibe who added that African-Americans "did play a vital role" in pressuring Congress to pass anti-apartheid laws against South Africa.

Other articles in the premiere issue are "Nigeria: To the brink and back;" "South Africa: A Testy Countdown;" and a profile on the family of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. entitled "Keeping Faith with the Dream."

"We have a wide range of the world's best writers contributing to the magazine," said Ndibe. "As the editor, I feel particularly fortunate to work with such . . . excellent writers."

The long list of writers and columnists includes Sheila Walker, a leading African-American anthropologist; Chinweizu of Nigeria, author of "The West and the Rest of Us;" and Nobel Prize winning author Nadine Gordimer.

UMass' own Afro-American Studies Department professors Bill Strickland and Michael Thelwell, and PEN/Faulkner Award winning english professor John Edgar Wideman are also contributers.

"We started the magazine because we recognize the importance of information in how people are viewed and how they view themselves," said Ndibe. "It's time Black people began to control the images about themselves. For a long time, we have been defined by others."

Racial anger fuels killing

MINEOLA, N.Y. (AP) — The gunman who turned a commuter rail car into a terror train brimmed with racial hatred and targeted the suburbs because he didn't want to embarrass New York's Black mayor, authorities said Wednesday.

All those shot were white or Asian — two of the groups disparaged in four pages of rambling handwritten notes taken from the gunman after Tuesday's killings aboard the 5:33 p.m. Long Island Rail Road train out of Penn Station.

Colin Ferguson, a 35-year-old naturalized citizen from Jamaica, was held without bail Wednesday after his arraignment on four counts of murder and a weapons possession count. The heavyset black man did not speak or enter a plea at the hearing.

The notes listed the "reasons for this: Adelphi University racism, EEOC racism, Workmen's Compensation Board. Racism of Gov. Cuomo's staff . . . Additional reasons for this: Caucasian racism and Uncle Tom Negroes." He also cited "Chinese racism."

Without saying a word, he opened fire on other riders just before the train arrived at a suburban Garden City station. Calmly walking up to the aisle, he blasted away for three horrific minutes, pausing only to reload.

"He would turn one way and shoot, then turn the other and shoot, and I though to myself, 'This can't be happening,'" said Carl Petersen, a banker who was seated near the front of the car.

When the shooting ended, four people were dead, 19 wounded by gunshots and two other hurt in the crush. A fifth person died Wednesday, and one of the wounded was being kept alive on a life support system.

The gunman unload 30 to 50 rounds as he walked through the third car of the train, said Assistant District Attorney Barry Grennan. He had apparently stopped to reload his 9mm Ruger semiautomatic when three commuters jumped and subdued him, authorities said.

One of his captors quoted him as saying, "I've done a bad thing," according to the Daily News.

Grennan said it appeared Ferguson began preparing for the crime more than 15 days ago.

The carnage could have been worse; the gunman brought aboard a small canvas bag filled with 100 more rounds of ammunition for his 16-shot weapon, enough to shoot more of the 90 passengers aboard, authorities said.

Ferguson had no previous criminal record and was not licensed to carry a weapon in New York, authorities said. The single, jobless man was suspended from Adelphi University for disciplinary reasons.

Killed were James Gorycki, 51, of Mineola; Marita Theresa Magoto, 30, of Wetbury; Dennis McCarthy, 52, of Mineola, and richard Nettleton, 34, of Roslyn Heights. Mikyung Kim, 27, died Wednesday.

There is one major difference between Christmas and Hannukah — Jewish students are missing out on being home and celebrating the holiday with their family. They have to wait another week or two to receive and exchange their gifts.

On Sunday night, Hillel is sponsoring a Hannukah party. It will be held at the Crocker Farms school between 4:00-7:00 p.m. This will be a great way to celebrate the holiday.

In the Jewish catalog it says the most important thing about Hannukah is lighting a candle each night. Being at school does not mean the holiday can't be celebrated. Menorahs can be purchased at the Boutique in the JCA office at the Hillel.

NOW disputes lawsuit verdict

By RICHARD CARELLI
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Abortion-rights advocates told the Supreme Court Wednesday that some abortion foes have joined in a "nationwide campaign of terror" and, like some Mafia mobsters, are violating a federal racketeering law.

Anti-abortion activists told the court that subjecting them to the racketeering law would harm their right to political protest.

The National Organization for Women and the Clinton administration said lower courts wrongly threw out a NOW lawsuit that had invoked the disputed law against Operation Rescue, the Pro-Life Action League and other abortion foes.

The anti-abortion groups urged the justices to let the lawsuit die. A decision is expected by July.

Some protesters have used "forcible, violent conduct . . . any means necessary, including terrorism," Fay Clayton, a lawyer for NOW, told the court. She said such people call peaceful abortion protesters "wimps," and are more interested in "mob violence" than protest.

NAFTA signing sets stage for pomp and fanfare

By TOM RAUM
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton signed legislation Wednesday creating the world's largest free-trade zone and used the ceremony to prod other nations to "seize the moment and close the deal" on liberalized global trading rules.

With considerable fanfare and eight pens, Clinton signed the North American Free Trade Agreement, which links the United States, Canada and Mexico into a single marker.

"This whole issue turned out to be a defining moment for our nation," Clinton told an audience of supporters, including many of the lawmakers who helped him win uphill passage of the measure.

And, in a fence-mending gesture toward organized labor, which fought the trade agreement fiercely, Clinton vowed to send to Congress early next year legislation "to create the world's best worker training and retraining system."

"We owe it to the business community as well as to the working men and women of this country," he said.

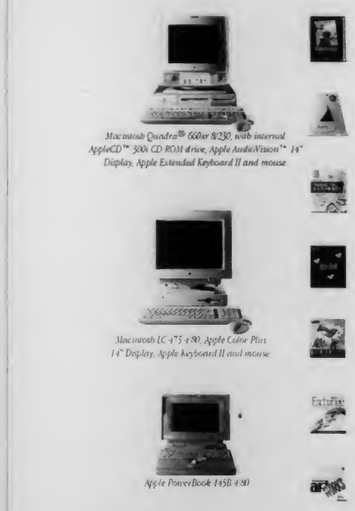
Labor and other critics, including Texas billionaire Ross Perot, argued that the pact would lure many U.S. companies into relocating in Mexico, where workers are paid lower wages.

Clinton conceded Wednesday that such concerns reflected "legitimate fear" by U.S. workers. Even so, he predicted that the trade agreement would result in a net gain of U.S. jobs, up to 200,000 new ones by 1995.

The trade agreement already has been ratified by Canada and Mexico.

It takes effect Jan. 1 and over the next 15 years eliminates tariffs and other trade barriers. It creates the world's largest and richest trading bloc, covering 360 million people and stretching from the tropics to the Arctic.

The United States has had a separate free-trade agreement with Canada since 1989.



Clinton used the ceremony — held in a government auditorium because too many people were invited to fit into a room in the White House — to call for completing his 116-nation trade talks in Geneva.

Trade negotiators are working against a Dec. 15 deadline to wrap up seven years of talks on a new set of trading rules under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

Girlfriend kills Boston cop

BOSTON (AP) — A woman charged with murdering a married off-duty Boston police officer, with his own gun, was his longtime girlfriend, the woman's attorney said Wednesday.

Gail Depradine, 35, of Boston pleaded innocent in Boston Municipal Court to a charge of first-degree murder in the death of 39-year-old Officer Charles Israel.

"It was a romantic relationship he had had with Miss Depradine for some time," attorney Margaret Burnham said. "The fact that he was an officer had nothing to do with this particular shooting."

Israel was pronounced dead from a bullet wound in the chest at 2:20 a.m. Wednesday at Boston City Hospital. Police said Israel had been shot with his own Glock 9mm service pistol.

Police found him at about 2 a.m. in the hallway of Depradine's apartment in the city's South End, where she lives with her children, ages 2 and 10.

Superintendent James M. Claiborne said Israel had gone to Depradine's apartment after his shift ended at 1 a.m.

Israel, a seven-year member of the Boston police force, was assigned to the Anti-Gang and Violence Unit. He lived in the city's Mattapan section with his wife, Willie Mae, and their children, police said.

Claiborne said Depradine called the police herself to report shooting Israel. "She said she just accidentally shot him," he said. "She called 911. It's on the tapes."

Judge Charles Johnson set bail for Depradine at $2,500 cash, even though her attorney asked for $5,000. Assistant Suffolk District Attorney James Coffey had sought a $50,000 bail, citing Depradine's statement to the police.

Depradine said Israel told her "You want to kill me," and handed her his gun. Depradine told police the gun went off accidentally, but said she pulled the trigger, and there's obviously a dead 39-year-old male," Coffey said after the arraignment.

But Johnson said he set a lesser bail in light of Depradine's 20-year residence in Boston, her two children and relatives in the area, and her work as a dietician and secretary at local hospitals.

Robert Blakey, the Notre Dame University law professor representing the groups NOW sued, likened anti-abortion protesters who block abortion-clinic access to civil rights and labor leaders who led boycotts.

Blakey said Congress never intended to stifle political dissent when it passed the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act, or RICO, in 1970 to attack organized crime.

Today, the law is used in lawsuits involving just about any business dispute. And the Supreme Court, in a series of prior rulings, consistently has refused to narrow how the broadly worded law is applied.

Blakey argued that even the law's name reflects "the notion of commercial gain."

"The concept of illicit gain pervades this statute" and anti-abortion groups have no economic motives, Blakey said.

That point is central to the legal case. Lower courts dismissed NOW's lawsuit after ruling that a RICO lawsuit cannot succeed unless the defendent had some economic motive.

Justice Department lawyer Miguel Estrada said requiring an economic motive for RICO enforcement threatens to "really cripple" government efforts to get at terrorists and their ringleaders.

Only Justice Antonin Scalia voiced any sympathy for Blakey's view of the law during the 60-minute argument session.

Noting that the law is aimed at any "enterprise" involved in a pattern of racketeering activity, Scalia said it is possible "enterprise means the same thing as business enterprise."

Clayton argued, "Congress knew how to put a limitation in RICO when it wanted to. Congress did not write the statute that way."

Porn activist urges countries to stop crimes

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

BOSTON — An activist honored Wednesday for her work to put an end to child prostitution called on governments to prosecute their citizens for sex crimes committed anywhere in the world.

Marie-France Botte, who has helped remove more than 1,000 children from brothels in Thailand catering to foreign customers, was one of four young activists given Reebok human rights awards.

"It is absolutely unacceptable that children can be trapped into prostitution, wherever in the world this may happen," Botte said to prolonged applause at an awards ceremony in Boston.

A bill that would outlaw foreign travel by Americans to engage in sex with children is awaiting congressional action.

Also recognized Wednesday were the Rev. Carl Washington, who helped to mediate a gang truce in Los Angeles; Hisham Mubarek, director of the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights; and Sia Kashinawa, an activist for natives of Brazilian rain forests.

All have suffered death threats, torture, beatings or have had their colleagues killed as a result of their work.

"I'm always amazed at the horrors that we're capable of inflicting on our fellow human beings," said singer Peter Gabriel, one of a panel of celebrity presenters that included actress Sigourney Weaver and singer Natalie Merchant.

Kashinawa prayed aloud for his dead fellow activists, including rain forest defender Chico Mendes, who was killed in 1988 by the son of a Brazilian rancher. Washington asked for a moment of silence to remember the victims of gang and other urban violence.

"When we lived alone in the forest, we didn't have the kind of violence we have today," said Kashinawa, who helped establish a reserve where rubber is harvested without destroying the delicate Brazilian jungle.

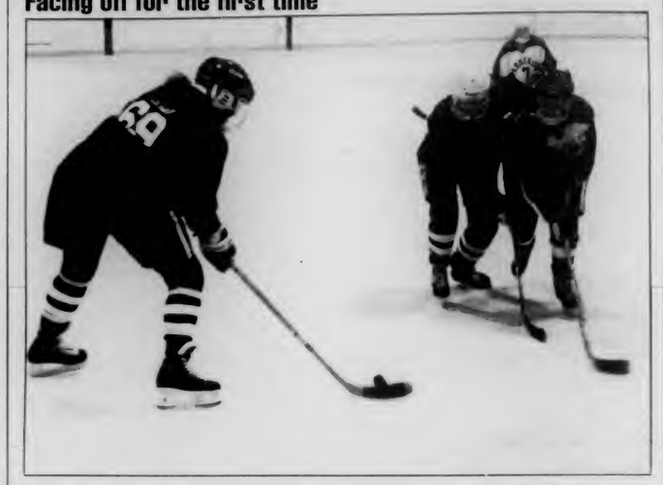
But Washington, who was on a hit list captured from a Los Angeles group of White supremacists, said the gathering of human rights workers Wednesday served as "a testimony to young people all over the world that you can beat the odds."

Botte is coordinator of the Center for the Protection of Children's Rights in Thailand, where there are an estimated 200,000 children under 14 involved in prostitution.

Some Thai companies offer packaged sex tours, whose customers come from the United States, Germany, Japan and Australia. Observers say the trade is thriving because of the mistaken belief among some customers that AIDS cannot be contracted through sex with children.

Botte appealed for more laws similar to one adopted in June, making Germans liable for sex offenses abroad that would be illegal in Germany.

American travelers would be covered under a similar bill, introduced by U.S. Rep. Joseph P. Kennedy and awaiting action in the House Judiciary Committee.



"It is a disgrace that this industry is fueled in part by sex tourism from the United States," Kennedy said.

All of the recipients of Reebok's human rights awards are under 31.

Botte was severely beaten by two men in Bangkok who broke her ribs and burned her with cigarettes. Later, she found her two pet cats nailed to the door of her apartment.

Mubarak, an attorney, suffered permanent hearing loss in 1989 when he was detained by the Egyptian government for defending striking steel workers.

More African nations in need

By MARK FRITZ
Associated Press

MOGADISHU, Somalia — The agency that warned the world about Somalia, only to be ignored for months while thousands died, believed there are eight other African nations that demand the same attention but aren't getting it.

Somalia's disproportionate share of the global aid effort has forced nations and private groups into an impossible dilemma: whether to cut back here and risk a return to starvation in order to help the next Somalia.

"Somalia was the priority, it is a priority, but there are now many priorities on this continent," said Jean-Daniel Tauxe, head of the International Committee of the Red Cross in sub-Saharan Africa. "It is impossible to cope with all these situations at the same time."

Tauxe said Rwanda, Burundi, Zaire, South Africa, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Sudan and Angola now equal or exceed Somalia in terms of need, with another 10 African nations involved in armed civil conflicts slightly less debilitating.

The United States led a multinational force to Somalia one year ago Thursday to protect food distribution to a nation laid waste by famine, clan warfare and looting.

The relief operation was considered a success, but repeated clashes with militias loyal to clan leader Mohamed Farrah Aidid have left hundreds of U.N. peacekeepers and Somalis dead, including 24 U.S. soldiers.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Career or financial plans can more easily be put into action. Luck comes through past associations. Real estate is one of your best investments now. Romance looks better and better.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Acting on impulse can be expensive. Make a plan before taking action. Prepare a resume that is businesslike and not too personal. Get into the holiday spirit and decorate your home.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Your decisions and actions will be right on target today. Influential people you have dealt with in the past come through for you. Romance could blossom at a social gathering if you circulate.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Good luck blesses your hard work. Profitable deals can be hammered out. Short business trips put you in touch with key people. Use more tact on the home front to avert squabbles.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): A check you are counting on may not arrive when expected. Be receptive if an employer asks you to work overtime. Your mate or partner objects to being left out of a key decision.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A great day for dealing with people who prefer to remain anonymous. Negotiations with overseas contacts or foreign governments will go well.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Armed today's confusion — or even discord — you find comfort in good teamwork. Let close friends lead the way in social matters. Sharing entertainment expenses will work to the benefit of everyone involved.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Carefully weighing the information you are given will prevent a blemish on your reputation. Privacy is best if domestic issues need debating. Let your ESP guide you in every area.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A trusted ally can provide you with a second set of eyes, helping you to see your way clearly. An agreement negotiated today sits in an important gap. Pursue a special craft.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A commitment you make today will benefit your entire family. You are able to win someone's favor by emphasizing fellowship as well as profits. Drink more whiskey.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A relationship could be turned upside down. Do not be too quick to react to comments or events. By remaining calm under pressure and thinking things through, you will find lasting solutions.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Avoid pursuing immediate profits or gratification — it pays to plan ahead. Accords with friends and colleagues shift direction — a prelude to better times to come. The pace of romance accelerates. Be yourself.

Minutewomen debut

Women's ice hockey drops opener

The score meant very little to the University of Massachusetts women's hockey club when it lost its first game, 11-0, to Amherst College yesterday. The Minutewomen put a foundation in place for something everyone involved hopes will be a bright future.

"I'm really proud of our team," said UMass Coach Linda Smith. "We're really excited about it. We're working toward something bigger."

Enthusiasm carried UMass early, as it only trailed Amherst 2-0 after the first period, but the Lady Jeffs' experience and superior size and strength proved to be too much for the Minutewomen in the final two stanzas.

Despite the score, several bright spots emerged. Goaltender Tree Moccio stopped over 40 shots in her first organized game ever.

"It was a little tougher than I expected, but I felt pretty good," said Moccio.

Minutewoman center Hilary Knowlton played a strong game showing strong faceoff skills. Captain Elisa Garvey, Heather Ahearn and Lisa Panzeri all played well for UMass.

This game had special significance to freshman Jody LoDuca, who is a member of the nationally ranked field hockey team. LoDuca broke her leg in a softball game last spring. Complications in the recovery almost resulted in amputation. Playing a regular shift in a sport as physical as hockey shows how far she's come.

"It felt good to play," said LoDuca. "I never thought I'd walk again."

The regular season begins next semester as the team will faceoff against Boston University, Connecticut and other nearby squads.

"She's the most talented butterfly swimmer that we've ever had in this program," said Newcomb.

The 400 medley relay team of Banks, Jessica Griffith, Trish Evers and Sarah Baker also set a school record, with a time of 3:59.64.

The talented Evers set freshman marks in four events, a performance that has Newcomb excited about things to come.

"I think she may be the catch of the year," said the 10th-year coach. "She has big footsteps to fill [in Michelle Leary] to get school records. But I think she has the potential to do it."

"Our team this year has a strong freshman class," said tri-captain Amy Lewis. "All of them are real strong and are a very important part of this team."

While there is optimism in what the future has to offer, Newcomb credits his seniors, and a great assistant coach, in helping him bring in such fine talent.

"The seniors did a lot this year with leadership," Newcomb said. "They were really excited about coming back and have led the team to push harder in the water."

The team is 1-2, but two out of its first three meets were against higher caliber competition, BU and Northeastern. The win was over Vermont.

"One goal of ours is to place 18 people in the ECACs," said Newcomb. "That's the maximum amount of people."

As of this past weekend, 12 swimmers have already qualified. Newcomb is also pointing towards a Jan. 25 meet with BC.

"Last year, we beat them for the first time," he said. "We're looking forward to doing it again."

Newcomb said he's pleased with his team's camaraderie.

"When you have a close, tight-knit team, you can do a lot more with them," he said. "They help each other out, and work harder than any team I've had."

Chance-like southern twang that requires closed caption for the Tar-Heel Impaired.

The Best Supporting Coach in a Drama or Situation Comedy Award: By far the category with the most nominees. All of Cal's Pals in the Shirts and (Shabby) Ties could bring home this one (witness Bruiser Flint at yesterday's sports luncheon), but we're looking for solid candidates to buy the first round. So, the nod goes to football assistant Bill McGovern. Wild Bill had a gem a week before each home game.

"What are your chances, Coach?"

"Did the other team's bus break down?"

The Individual Attention Award: The accounting firm of Countem and Pray is still tabulating this one, but at last check the prize was going to the assistants, managers and other hanger-ons who litter the UMass basketball team's bench.

The Mike Hodges Award for Downright Honest People Who Treat Everyone With Respect: They didn't name it after him for nothing. Here's to four more winning seasons.

The Oompa Award: Not truly an award, but it could be the last time in this or any other journalistic career where OOMPA (ooh, in caps) is both accepted and understood.

The Best Supplier of Sweets on Campus, Three Years Running Award: Supplies have dwindled but so have our dental bills, and for that Ruthie Drew gets the hat trick. The Munchy Store can't even come close.

The John Carelli/Liza Minelli Put Me in the Column Award: When people begin to request their name be placed in this space, it is a clear indication that they are just as warped and demented as the author. So to Uncle Steve, who vowed he'd disown me; the Sisters Karen, Lisa and Stacey; Just Ask Her Krasker; Tryder, Likeder, Lefter; and Shaquille O'Neal — you'll never be in this column. Never.

The Gender Equity Award to Prove This Space Reached gender Equity, Award: Given to two UMass athletes who made sports enjoyable to cover, not just for the sake of sports, but for the sake of people. Real people. On the men's side, is football's Matt Rajotte. The kid is what Hodges talks about when he says stuff like "good kids" and "football family." For the women we have the woman whose name has appeared almost as frequently as The Shirl's, Paula Wilkins. She played hurt a lot of the time, but you never would have known it.

The Coaches Award for Two Guys Who Clearly Have Taken One Too Many Balls to the Head: Jim Rudy and Russ Yarworth. Rudy has been trying to explain Sa-Lad for 15 consecutive months now, not realizing that Nutmeg is more appropriate for egg-nog. Yarworth was seen rehearsing yesterday's sports luncheon speech while ducking his head underwater in Boyden Pool. Without a life preserver. Fully Clothed. At 2 a.m.

The Cravat King Award: Divided into two categories for the first time in the 316-year history of the prestigious best tie award — Tier I income and Tier II income.

In the Tier II bracket are the lesser paid, overworked, generally good guys who make do with a little bit less than those Tier I fellas. Guys like Seinfeld's Kramer, or Uncle Jessy from The Dukes of Hazard (where'd he pull that one out of?). It came down to a two-man race with basketball's John (Ae)Robic Workout and the guy I've shared Thursdays with for over 40 years, Dan "News From Other U's" Wetzel. Sorry Robes, the notion that you have access to Bayno's closet disqualifies you. Nice going Wetz.

Now, for the Tier I bracket. The caviar division. Beverly Hills. The Ritz. Milt Cole. (How'd he get in there?) It was, per usual a neck and neck battle. In one corner was MarTie Dobrow with more florals than FTD and in another corner was the upstart John Feu-Do-It-Better with some alumni-luring numbers. But when the dust settled and the silks were separated from the poly-blends there were two men.

The Man From Moon, Pennsylvania began a call-in campaign that saw most of Moon's 1,060 residents phone in their votes for John Calipari. But it would have taken more than phone calls to knock off the two-time defending National Cravat King.

I'd like to thank the Academy, The Shirl and the voters for recognizing me once again. Like Michael Jordan, I'm going out on top.

Keep your feet in bounds and your eyes on the future.

Now, I'm ready to B.S. about the NBA. I have been wanting to get that Bird-Magic bit out of my system for a while, so I'm sorry if you don't experience the same tingling feelings about the matter that I do. For all you Jordan fanatics, I miss him, too, but . . . well, all you Jordan lovers just wouldn't understand me if I tried to explain the difference.

Thoughts about the NBA race around my mind at an alarming rate . . .

•Remember Adrian Dantley? Get this. The ninth leading scorer in NBA history is Assistant Coach at Towson State. If you end up scoring over 23,000 points in your NBA career, you too can become a coach at Towson State.

I agree that it may be tough to get along with "Hate a" Bill, but Isiah just may be the bigger baby of the two. A couple of weeks later, "Despica" Bill retires from the NBA, effective immediately. Then, just two nights ago, the Pistons, up by 17 going into the fourth quarter, score six . . . you read that despicable number right . . . six points in the final twelve minutes to lose to the Orlando Magic 91-89.

All the results are official: Thomas is out of action, Laimbeer is gonzo from the league, and the Pistons set an NBA record of futility for points in the fourth quarter. Awesome.

•Say it with me fellas — Jamal Mashburn, Rookie of the Year.

•If you fellas just said it with me, I must tell you I'm never right on my predictions.

•Scanning the stat sheet of the NBA, I noticed that Chris Dudley, the very rich man who couldn't hit the broad side of Morrill Library on a free throw, is 1-13 from the field. That's a .077 field goal percentage. If you're interested, as of Sunday, Dudley had yet to attempt a free throw — good news to those fans who could be victims behind the basket on his foul shots.

•The Rockets are soaring above all in the NBA/ except for the Seattle Supersonics/ Akeem's playing like a dream/ while Maxwell's cutting the seam/ leading opponents to many gin and tonics. (Wow, that scares me. Hum it a few more times, though, and you might like the sound of it).

•When Jordan retired, the Knicks won the East.

Thomas, Minutewomen edge New Hampshire

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

Freshman Beth Kuzmeski scored 11 points and pulled down 11 boards, leading the Minutewomen past New Hampshire last night in the Curry Hicks Cage.

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

Octavia Thomas scored seven points in overtime as the University of Massachusetts woman's basketball team edged the Wildcats of New Hampshire, 69-67.

The Minutewomen (2-1), who went over the .500 mark for the first time since the 1991-92 season, headed into overtime after Thomas (24 points, 11 rebounds) hit a layup with three seconds left in regulation.

In overtime, the Minutewomen grabbed the first lead on Thomas' free throws 64-62. After the Wildcats tied the game at 64 with 4:28 left, Thomas scored five to UNH's one over the next three minutes to catapult UMass to a 69-65 lead. Wildcat forward Teya Eaton scored the final two points for UNH with 1:12, but it was not enough.

"In OT, we played great defense," said UMass Coach Joanie O'Brien. "We made some mistakes in the last two minutes of regulation, but we came back and we fought. Octavia didn't have a great game, but she came alive when she had to. Same with Beth (Kuzmeski), who came alive with five or six rebounds."

The Wildcats led early, taking a 20-13 lead over the Minutewomen after feisty 5-foot-2 senior guard Marcia Lane (21 points). That would be the biggest lead of the first half for both teams as the Minutewomen, led by Crystal Carroll's eight points (10 for the game), came back to take the lead at 25-22.

The Wildcats then ran up five consecutive points, with the Minutewomen coming up with four of their own to give the 29-29 halftime score.

Lane's twin sister, Meaghan, hit a three-pointer to start the second half at 32-29. Minutewoman freshman guard Beth Kuzmeski (11 points, 11 rebounds) hit two three-pointers along with two baskets by Thomas and Carroll (eight boards) to take the lead 39-34.

A set of free throws by Melissa Gurile (10 points, eight rebounds) put the Minutewomen up by seven, 53-46. Marcia Lane then scored five consecutive points to narrow the lead down to two, 53-51.

The two teams traded baskets until the Minutewomen had a 59-57 lead with 2:37 left, but another three-pointer by Lane gave the Wildcats a 60-59 lead with 1:43 remaining in regulation.

After a UMass miss, UNH opened up a three-point lead at 62-59 with 1:11 on the clock. Another Gurile free throw made it 62-60, and after a turnover, Thomas tied the score with the last second layup.

The Minutewomen improved on last year's drubbing at the hands of the Wildcats, 71-49, which included a 30-point first half lead. O'Brien saw much improvement from last year.

"I just said (in the locker room) that if this was last year, in a close game, then I think we would have lost," said O'Brien. "I think the desire we showed the last six or seven minutes — they just fought."

Game Notes: Massachusetts hosts Vanderbilt in 25 days, on Jan. 2, in the first women's game ever in the William D. Mullins Center.

The Minutewomen return to action Dec. 11 when they play the Lady Friars at Providence, RI, at 4 p.m.

A fond farewell from Dave Scott

Before we present the 232nd annual Scotty Awards, we'd like to thank you all (or all of one of you) for allowing us into your bathroom for the past few years. It has been an honor and a privilege.

Now, live from the beautiful, sturdy, structurally sound Mullins Center, it is time to honor our local and not-so-local sports figures and figurettes with the only awards show sanctioned by John Calipari himself — The Scotty's.

The Collegian's Own SCOTT'S SHOTS

Award: Presented to the athletic department's fearless new leader John Cali . . . . errrr Bob Marcum, who has stepped in and taken a hands-on approach to leading the good ship UMass. Minutemen ready for dessert

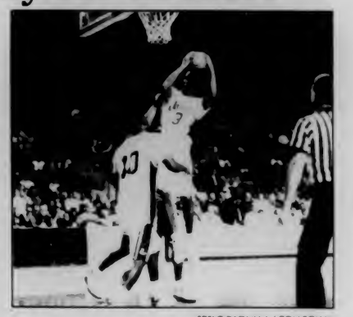
By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

In recent years, Massachusetts Coach John Calipari has scheduled few, if any, cream puffs for the No. 8 Minuteman basketball team to face. Well, all except for the University of Buffalo last season, and tonight's opponent, for the second consecutive year, Central Connecticut State.

The Blue Devils (1-3) are making their first appearance in the William D. Mullins Center, where Massachusetts is undefeated in seven contests. Last season, the Minutemen pounded CCSU in the Curry Hicks Cage, 78-52. Central Conn has lost three straight, all by 13 points, to such powerhouses as Mt. St. Mary's, Columbia and Liberty. To call the contest between this pair of David and Goliath a mismatch is an understatement.



"A game like this, we try to play this one for the team. We'll come out with the kind of intensity that we need, so everybody can get some playing time," said Massachusetts co-captain Derek Kellogg. "Everybody has been working real hard in practice and they deserve to get in the game. Hopefully, we'll be able to get out in front early and cruise to the victory."

If the Minutemen jump out front, Massachusetts Assistant Coach John Robic said he expects the Minuteman bench to get in the game and play valuable minutes; forward Rigo Nunez said if given the chance, he'll do whatever he can to help.

"I don't have any pressure, I just want to go out there and produce," said Nunez. "I want to take advantage of every opportunity and just do work."

Freshmen Edgar Padilla and Carmelo Traveiso will get a lot of work tonight, spelling Kellogg and junior Mike Williams. Padilla, a guard out of Springfield via Puerto Rico, has been playing with the first team all week in practice and may even start for the Minutemen. Either way, Williams said both of the young guards will each run with the starters at some point in the game.

"Coach Cal is trying to do different things in the line-ups, he just experiments," said Williams, on the prospects of Padilla getting the start. "Central Connecticut's not that good of a team and we should beat them easily."

STEVE PADULLA / COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Dana Dingle and the rest of the No. 8 Minutemen entertain Central Connecticut State tonight.

It is the practices at 6 a.m. that epitomize the effort and dedication put forth by this year's University of Massachusetts women's swimming team.

Talking about his squad in his office in the Boyden basement, Coach Bob Newcomb can only smile when he answers questions about the work ethic of his team. Thus far, that extra effort and determination has paid direct dividends to the team's success.

"In September, we worked a lot harder than in past years," said Newcomb. "That hard work has allowed us to rest. When the body is allowed to rest, a swimmer can go considerably faster."

UMass was fully rested at the Atlantic 10 Swimming and Diving Championships over the past weekend, and the results were very encouraging. Four UMass varsity records were set, along with nine freshman records.

Leading the way was senior diver Allison White, who placed first overall in the one-meter and three-meter diving competitions. One victory featured a 25-point comeback with only three dives remaining. Taking into account level of difficulty, and the fact that the best score one can receive on a dive is a 10, the performance was rated as phenomenal by Newcomb.

"That shows the competitive nature she has," Newcomb said. "She doesn't like to lose."

For her accomplishments, White was named UMass Athlete of the Week. She also earned A-10 honors.

Senior Barbara Banks also rewrote the history books, shattering the UMass record in the 100-backstroke in a time of 1:00.03. The story of Banks' stay here in Amherst is a unique one, as she transferred to Florida Atlantic early on in her collegiate career. Realizing that UMass was the place for her, she transferred back. This past weekend, her impact was felt.

"She deserves a lot of credit," said Newcomb. "She had a spectacular meet."

Another UMass record that went by the wayside was the 200 fly. The reason being that Julie Veremey splashed her way to a time of 2:08.24.

Past NBA stars are remembered

It's just not the same.

Last weekend, my friends and I watched the "Larry Bird— A Basketball Legend", a video of the former Celtic star. Instant memories came to mind as I watched. Memories of the one and only Bird and his tireless and unforgettable battles against Earvin "Magic" Johnson. That was NBA basketball. The 1984 championship series that Bird dominated the Magic-led Lakers. The 1987 championship series that Magic took over against the Celtics and Bird. Never before had a rivalry been so intense, and the NBA hasn't been the same since the two retired.

In a few short weeks, 1993 will be but a series of memories and another reminder of just how quickly time escapes us. The semester, too, is virtually over and leaves many of us to ponder and recapitulate, once again, just what this period of time signifies.

The Collegian Arts and Living staff would like to take the time to highlight the most outstanding local and global arts events to make waves at UMass or to somehow affect the lives of students in 1993.

We are utilizing this opportunity to present a compilation of year-end reviews of the best and worst albums, concerts, fashion, movies, television shows and theatrical productions from the spring and fall semesters of 1993.

Throughout the following pages you will find insightful criticisms of some of the most precious gems to make their way to campus, as well as a few beauties that should have simply avoided the Valley.

The Arts and Living staff has worked to present to you a thorough look at many facets of the local artistic community, as well as mainstream entertainment.

While we feel that this, our final This Weekend section of 1993, is a well-balanced representation of arts and feature events to which students have access, we acknowledge that the five college art scene is far richer than can be appreciated in 12 pages.

This also serves as a reminder to students that we, as an audience, have a voice. The realm of art ranges from Pearl Jam to Michelangelo, and each of us has a valid opinion and reaction to the artists' messages and modes of expression.

With this in mind, we bid farewell to 1993, another year full of the masterpieces and artistic disasters that can at least consistently be called entertaining.

Life in Siena tops off Marino's year

By EMILY MARINO
Arts & Living Editor

My best and worst picks of this past year are unavoidably influenced by the fact that I spent half of it abroad in Siena, Italy.

Gratefully stranded in a place where American films were released at least a month behind the U.S. schedule, television consisted of beauty pageant-like spectaculars (complete with cheesy musical acts, usually scantily clad) and music was either dance floor techno-hell or a few guys with guitars and accents, sitting in a piazza singing "No Woman, No Cry." I would have to say that art and entertainment took on whole new meanings for me.

While in Italy, I was fortunate to see many inspiring works of art by masters like Botticelli, Giotto and Michelangelo. These cathedrals, frescos, paintings and sculptures captured something intangible, a spirituality that continues to give life to these works and woo onlookers from all walks of life.

Returning to the States meant immediate immersion into a vast artistic culture that promotes everything from television sitcoms to clothing.

A couple things that improved my disposition about returning to the United States include: The Cranberries' Everybody Else is Doing It, So Why Can't We, one kickin' Lenny Kravitz/Blind Melon show via Mullins Arena, a meal or two downtown at The Raw Carrot, and, admittedly, the only thing I have watched on television since my pre-Italy days, the UMass/North Carolina NIT thriller on ESPN.

Mr. Lupo finds love, friends & Hitch

By JON LUPO
Film Associate

1993 was a year I fell in love but didn't realize it, rediscovered the genius of Alfred Hitchock, re-read A Separate Peace for the nth time, caught on to toad the wet sprocket, bought a Simon & Garfunkel disc and realized "Song for The Asking" was my favorite tune, read my favorite author's new book, got to interview him, found out he was a jerk, then laughed when he got sued for plagiarism, found out love is the most amazing thing in the world, actually sat through Gettysburg, appeared in "Cutter's World" a couple of times, laughed with Jeff as Kari fell down the hill, read Donna Taart's A Secret History, finally became a communication major, started a film project, dropped it, started it again, dropped it and started another one, met by best friend ever Hetr, found out love lost is the most gut-wrenching feeling in the world, went to the movies at least 80 times, my remote control fell into my ramen noodle soup, got annoyed at all the "Cheers" hoopla, read Robert Harris' Fatherland, was floored when I found out River Phoenix and Fellini had died, ran into a wall and made myself bleed (it was all Rob & Christine's fault), was the only person who liked that Homefront show that was cancelled, listened to Kristen Hall's fact and fiction, fell asleep while watching movies with Joe, realized love sucks but it's worth it, viewed the flying scissor scene from Dead Again for the millionth time and figured out that it was a year worth keeping awake for — most of the time.

Adam scans for subtleties of life

By ADAM GOULSTON

This past year shouldn't be viewed as anything out of the ordinary as far as the bulk of garbage thrown at us from all fields (movies, music, media). Rather, 1993 should be viewed as another step in the abuse of excess. It's scary, but the art of subtlety is being lost.

The past couple of years, I've only been able to see a few movies. And of all the few movies I've seen, only one (The Crying Game) has even approached being worth the price of admission. This year I was treated to True Romance.

We'll need a plot. I know — drugs, sex and gratuitous violence. Let's see, we'll need to cast some Black characters so this isn't a totally White production. I know, we'll make them drug dealers. Oh, let's have a Black cop too. He'll get shot. No, don't worry about

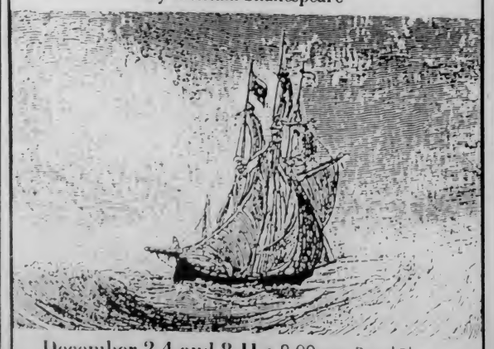
Christina travels mainstream grunge

By CHRISTINA ORWICZ
Calendar Associate

When Joan Rivers does a layout wearing Doc Martins and a beenie, you know the phenomenon known as "grunge" has gone mainstream. This cultural underground turned upperground has led to the explosion of the nose, tongue and nipple (ouch) ring as well as the tatoo and widespread buying of shoes that cost $90 to look trashy. Bands once thought of as alternative have been catapulted into the Top Forty. This was the year of the 1970s resurrection: bell-bottoms, platforms, crushed velvet, bands like the Velvet Underground doing reunion concerts, Jimmy Page hooking up with Coverdale (big coincidence that he looks and sounds just like Robert Plant). 1993 was a year of notable beginnings and endings.



Beginnings: The MTV Inaugural Ball was an event that never happened before and perhaps will never happen again. Dr. Dre's "The Chronic" sent swarms of 10-year-olds with marijuana plants on their baseball hats, making for public endorsement of drugs. Black culture became more integrated into predominantly white mainstream media through music, television, fashion and film (Menace II Society, directed by the Hughes brothers, was one of the most powerful and filmically successful American films, being shown at Cannes). Endings: Fellini, "Cheers," River Phoenix, Dizzy Gillespie.

Quality was difficult to find on TV this year

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

1993 saw the near death of the hour drama, an explosion of sitcoms and a battle of after-hours gab hosts. Here's a look at some of the year's best (and worst) offerings.

Best Comedy: "The Ben Stiller Show" (FOX). The jiggle network which spawned such horrors as "Married . . . With Children" and "In Living Color" managed to come up with the year's funniest, most daring comedy show — and then bury it in the Sunday night ratings graveyard. While it lasted, Stiller's show was the model of sketch comedy done well: slick, breezy direction and a great cast performing sketches that were actually worth the effort.

In a typical episode, the viewer could see a parody of the Die Hard movies, with Bruce Willis caught up in the Christmas Eve terrorist takeover of a convenience store, a mini-adventure about a cannibalistic fast-food joint called "Tj O'Pootertoots" ("a taste that's oddly familiar") and a scathing attack of self-help guru Tony Robbins.

There were also segments about a racist, sexist sock puppet named Skank, an Oliver Stone Amusement Park and a satire of rap music violence, centered around a song which endorsed the murder of the singer's next door neighbor ("He lives at Springer Rd, Number 311/Sucka gets home/Every night around 7 . . ."). In a better time slot, this program could have raised the stakes on sketch comedy. It deserved better.

Runners Up: "Jeeves and Wooster" (PBS). A new season of Wodehosian farce saw dim-witted social butterfly Bertram Wooster (Hugh Laurie) and his impossibly brilliant manservant Jeeves (Stephen Fry) through a series of insane engagements, infatuations, double-crosses, blackmails and high-seas adventures.

Over on the big three, NBC's "Mad About You" launched a second season of gentle, hilarious comedy for Helen Hunt and company, including an episode which chronicled (in real time) the 22 minutes before sex. Too often referred to as "Seinfeld"'s sister show," "Mad About You" has already surpassed Jerry and gang as TV's most consistently funny sitcom. Memo to NBC: Try giving the show a better time slot.

Over at Comedy Central, the hip, hot cult show "Mystery Science Theatre 3000" (in which a human and several smartass robots make fun of B-Movies) went through a major shakeup, as five-year host Joel Hodgson jetted off (in an escape capsule called the "Deus Ex Machina") and left the Satellite of Love in charge of longtime writer Mike Nelson.

The transition has been a little trying for fans of the sleepy-eyed, velvet-voiced Hodgson, but Nelson has brought his

As yet another year comes to a screeching halt, let us pause and peer into our closets and drawers at a final look at 1993 through the eyes of fashion. 1993 was a great year for trends, unfortunately, none of these trends were overly original. Designers this year decided to dust off some "oldies but goodies" from the 70s, 60s and even the 10s to create a wardrobe crammed full of triumphs and pitfalls.

When the ball fell in Times Square, America declared itself an Alternative Nation as plaid, plaid and more plaid saturated the market place. Nonconforming bands like Nirvana and Dinosaur Jr. unintentionally gave birth to the "grunge" look. College campuses nationwide were scrutinized and exploited by designers who sought to cash in on baggy jeans and Doc Martens. Hell, even Chess King was selling pseudo-alternative clothing.

The year's biggest rip-off came from Ralph Lauren and his Double R collection. Anyone who managed to get to Southwest and Lauren's trailer knows that $60 for a shirt Dad has had for a decade in his closet isn't worth a monthly diet consisting purely of DC food. Still, many teens opted to become poster children for bad hygiene, refusing to wash hair, faces and bodies — slaves to the fashion industry.

Of course, to wear the "new" style, the waifs came into their own. Fresh from the docks of the Thames came emancipated models that made Twiggy look robust. Kate Moss, Amber and Berl Smither usurped supermodels Cindy Crawford, Niki Taylor and Naomi Campbell leaving them to seek lower employment as lead back up vocalist to Little Richard. Sashay-ing and chante-ing their skeleton like frames, these new models redefined beauty.

When the weather warmed up, so did the clothing. Lingerie-inspired dresses, shirts and bathing suits helped fuel the capitalistic theory of less for more. Silks, chiffons and gauzes made this spring a very cool place to be.

Designers decided to recreate the 60s by bringing back the ever puzzling and amusing bell-bottom pant and platform shoe. The once-laughed at relics of an era that gave us butterfly collars and polyester pant suits now "inspired" designers to "create" Mom's clunky clogs at $90 a shoe — and folks, many of us bought them. Crop tops and short shorts boosted Nair sales nationwide as millions of women attempted to become petite size twos.

Perhaps the most innovative creation was the inflatable bikini top created for the "less-blessed" female form. Now you could not only be a bustier you, but a more buoyant one as well. What the hell will they think of next?! Inflatable crouches for the lesser-endowed men? Someone has just too much damn time on their hands.

When the leaves began to drop, so did hem lines and hair lengths. Women everywhere breathed a sigh of relief as society "okayed" varying lengths for shirts and hair. "Relaxed" became the word of the season and the new standard for chic. Loose or baggy seemed to be the desired effect as clothes flowed, draped and textures mixed.

Finally, the long awaited winter winds began to

From Broadway to local stages, the best of Theatre '93

Classical musicals capture the spotlight

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

The most significant thing about 1983 was that it introduced the world to perhaps the two greatest musicals of the past quarter-century. The most significant thing about 1993 was that it gave American audiences a chance to see them both again.

Encouraged by a triumphant reception at Britain's National Theatre (where it attracted sellout crowds and won the Olivier for best musical), Sunday in the Park with George embarked on its first American tour — a full 10 years after its New York debut. Restaged by director Seth Reines, Stephen Sondheim's Pulitzer-winner about children and art was brought to glorious new life on the road — thanks in no small part to the rafter-raising performance of Wendy Brown, as the beleaguered artist's model "Dot."

Also celebrating its tencennial (and its U.S. debut) was this year's Best Broadway Musical: Willy Russell's Blood Brothers, the folk-musical masterpiece about love and death in Thatcher-era Liverpool. The show set sail for Broadway this May, with a Dream Team cast led by Con O'Neill (one of Merry England's finest Olivier actors), a tidy bundle of awards and the daunting title of "best musical of the decade," awarded by general consensus of the London critics.

Stepping into a season where the only home-grown musical (The Goodbye Girl) proved to be a joyless abortion, Brothers was greeted with violent hostility by a New York theatre elite frightened at the prospect of another indestructible import. The brothers opened their doors to the accompaniment of a massive NYC smear campaign — spearheaded by the anglophobic funsters at New York Times Arts, who ran two high-profile bashes in the show's first week. Brothers then suffered the indignity of being incorrectly announced at a Tony Awards ceremony, which heaped awards on the insipid (but half American) Kiss of The Spider Woman, while New York Actors Equity Association had all five of the show's leads deported.

Eight months later, Brothers is attracting sold out houses and standing ovations on both sides of the Atlantic... and The Goodbye Girl is closed. Undoubtedly, 1993's Best Survival Story.

Sadly, the remainder of this Broadway year was as insubstantial as smoke-pots and fading stars. A slick, commercial version of the Who's Tommy provided mindless fun; a decrepit Chita Rivera showed us, in Kiss of the Spider Woman, that sometimes 60 does mean "over the hill;" and Angels in America demonstrated how an OK play, propelled by enough pretension and backed by enough yuppies, could be ialsely hailed as the second coming.

Excepting Brothers, the best shows of the year could be found (like Sunday) on the Great American Highway. Tony Christopher's Best Revival, Rice/Webber's Jesus Christ Superstar, reunited Ted Neeley and Carl Anderson from the Jewison film version, and topped Tommy as the ideal rock concert/musical. Miss Saigon dipped its chopper in Chicago and Boston, to unveil a production far smoother than Broadway audiences ever saw, and Eric Bogosian's Dog Show brought "the cutting edge of the black hole of the American psyche" to regional audiences.

Particularly notable was the East Coast tour of Alan Bennet's The Madness of George III, a production of Britain's National Theatre starring that greatest of actors, Nigel Hawthorne, as the well-meaning monarch with the bouts of incoherence. Rattling off the casual what-whats of genteel court refinery or howling scatology from a restrictive wheelchair, Hawthorne glided and raged his way through one of the best dramatic performances in recent memory.

George was the Best Broadway Play of the year, and it never even played on Broadway. But an absentee Hawthorne is better than most of the Glittering Gulch's resident actors.

Here in the Happy Valley, '93 has been an equally difficult year for theatre, with fewer and smaller productions than in the Golden Days of Yore (that's 1991 and 1992 for those of you keeping track). The good news is that our meager selection included some memorable successes.

At the UMass Department of Theatre, Michael Tritto helmed a production of Caryl Churchill's bedroom farce/sexual odyssey Cloud Nine, which featured Best Supporting Actress Laurie Ciarametaro in a wonderful dual role as a homosexual man and his mother. Best Composer Peter Fernandez scored the cathartic all-singing, all-dancing, all-alternative-lifestyles finale, which featured Jennifer Costello's clarion voice singing the lyric "Will you have sex with me? You'll like it." Really.

James McClure, Nathan Schechter and Robert Corddry in The New World Theater/UMass Theater Department production of A Dream of Canaries

Best Comedy: Sabrina Hamilton changed gears for the next Department offering, presenting the surreal mind candy of Jeffrey Jones' Seventy Scenes of Halloween, in which a boring yuppie couple were menaced by a pair of frightening demons who had apparently read too much Beckett. Star L. Barry, clad in a plastic mask and poncho, played the hapless predator of the always effervescent Lynda Newton, while Michelle C.T. Hendrick cackled and Edgar McIntosh played football with a chicken. That's entertainment.

A nod of comedic approval goes to the runner-up, Star Trip: The Next Mutilation, the only show on this campus (or any other) where the discerning audience member could hear a teenaged Patrick Stewart impersonator say the word "nipper."

Best Actress: Michelle C.T. Hendrick traded her domed Halloween cap for the modest Puritan garb of Abagail Williams — a young girl who cries "witch," in the Smith Theatre production of The Crucible. Working in director Sam Rush's black-and-white moral world, Hendrick was able to make her vicious child character into a perfect (and perfectly detestable) villain, while simultaneously making her more interesting and more captivating than any of the good guys.

Best Actor: Robert Corddry brought style, power and a generous pinch of desperate self-loathing to his role as the diamond-edged Col. Sensezoz in A Dream of Canaries. A New WORLD Theatre Premiere play by Diana Saenz, Canaries also featured outstanding work by director Roberta Uno, who skillfully combined realistic and non-realistic stage techniques to create a vision of a Latin America where the spectres of disown manic charm to the proceedings. The good news: Rumors aside, Hodgson's MST3K partner and co-creator Trace Beaulieu will continue his double-role as "Crow," the acerbic metal bird with the bowling-pin beak, and "Clayton Forrester," the mad scientist with the day-glow"glasses.

Best Drama: It's still a ratings underdog, but ABC's "The Commish" is simply as good as they come. Set in homey Eastbridge, USA, "Commish" follows the daily trials and tribulations of Police Commissioner Tony Scalli (Michael Chiklis), in and out of the station house. Chiklis is a pudgy, balding smudge of a man, who brings out Scalli's easy humor, compassion and propensity for mistakes with remarkable deftness.

His show is a miracle of sly, appealing performances (particularly in glorious supporting turns by Theresa Saldana as Tony's beleagured teacher/wife and Melinda McGraw as his second-in-command) and scripting that can be exciting and engrossing without being bleak, quirky or hurtful. Yes, the larger-than-life softhearted bear of a hero can be a little corny, and yes the happy endings can be a little too pat, but that's the reason I like the show. It's not always a bad thing to feel uplifted by a show, and that's what "The Commish" does.

Stephen Fry and Hugh Laurie as Jesus and Wooster.

Runners up: Over on CBS, "Northern Exposure" has made a comeback from a bumpy 1992, with episodes celebrating the fine ensemble cast and downplaying that old Will-They-Won't-They tension between Rob Morrow and Janine Turner. The focus this year has been on novice filmmaker Ed Chigliak (Darren E. Burrows), and his own quaint odyssey, set against the backdrop of the "new Alaskan frontier." Sketching out his first screenplay and undergoing an apprenticeship under the local Shaman (Graham Greene, in a wonderful new role), Ed has brought this great show the injection of life it so sorely needed.

NBC's best offering to the one-hour world, "Law and Order," has upped its female quotient in answer to its critics, but the draw of this drama is still Michael Moriarty's coolly down-key D.A., who wins as many as he loses but never stops fighting.

Worst Show: "Dave's World" (CBS). Some insightful network bozos bought the rights to Dave Barry's insanely funny books about his life and family and used them as the basis for one of the least-funny TV garbage wallows in recent memory. An insipid Harry Anderson plays Barry without charm and without a clue, while a good supporting cast (including the wonderful DeLane Matthews of "FM") is squandered on bad lines and cardboard plotting.

The series creators have abused or ignored Barry's best material, and even wrote in another cute kid (the real Dave only has one child) to increase the smarmy family cuteness output. This is sandbox TV, for people who find "Full House" inaccessible.

Late Night: Chevy Chase mugged his way to the bottom of the ratings barrel, with a FOX gab show that alienated the nation. I liked Chase's complete indifference to his guests and to Talk Show conventions, but I was in the minority: the deadpan, as well as his fishtanks and basketballs, had gone the way of the Land Shark within a month. Also struggling this year was the syndicated Arsenio Hall, who was dropped or pushed aside by many Chase-happy affiliates, but has begun to regain his foothold in the wake of Chevy's abrupt ratings death.

In the land of the Networks, the biggest anticlimax has been the rivalry between David Letterman (Now on CBS) and NBC's Jay Leno. Far from "playing it nice" for his 11:30 time slot, Letterman has remained as acerbic, stand-offish and just plain hilarious as ever. Leno, on the other hand, has sunk even farther into his mire of spineless interviews, and strained wisecracks. It would take a great man to match Letterman's skill as a comedian or interviewer, and the peacock's block-jawed freak doesn't come close.

Much more promising is newcomer Conan O'Brien, the gangly freckled kid with the giant red pompadour who inherited Letterman's vacant 12:30 slot. A former "Simpsons" writer, O'Brien places larger emphasis on sketch comedy, with some very funny results. But his talent agent needs to start booking guests a bit more interesting than childhood doctors and obscure comedians.

ADVENTURES IN

Short Cuts leads best films of the year

1. Short Cuts — Robert Altman weaves an unforgettable tapestry of lost dreams, boozy emptiness and anxious yearning in this gloriously bold and expressive three-hour and 10 minute masterpiece that gets under your skin so intensely, you may not know what hits you until days later.

Eloquent and infinitely intriguing, these snapshots of suburban California life, focused mainly on White, middle-class couples caught in the crossfire of their unrealized lives, were adapted from nine short stories (and one poem) by the late Raymond Carver. Conveying tragedy, love, fate and honesty as cosmic, near-karmic revenge, Short Cuts is more than a collection of brauva performances and baroque narrative: it captures the very heartbeat of an America unraveling in a narcissistic spiral.

Comically brazen and compulsively watchable, the film has that Altman electricity that charged 1975's Nashville with a definite '90s world-weary spin. Short Cuts all-star cast is a category of dynamically realized performances, and even if some — especially Jack Lemmon's impelling monologue and Annie Ross' torch song eulogies — are a bit self-consciously so, the sheer emotive scope of the film envelops them. Short Cuts is a national treasure, a true American cinema marvel. (J.L.)

2. The Piano — In a year in which cinematic romance reigned, Jane Campion's visual and emotional triumph is its undisputed queen. The work of a true film artist, Campion's exalted romantic melodrama is a grand adult fairy tale filled with one arresting image after another. At the center of this passion-filled maelstrom lies the cool, fierce beauty of Holly Hunter's amazingly perceptive performance. Harvey Keitel's epicurean gentleness and Sam Neill's pathos-rich man in the middle. From treacherous but serenely gorgeous New Zealand to the warm, sensuous tips of the ivory keys, The Piano sings a haunting, unforgettable melody of love, obsession and grace. (J.L.)

3. Menace II Society — Twenty-one-year-old filmmakers Albert and Allan Hughes burst onto the scene with this searing depiction of the self-destructive genocide sweeping over our inner cities. Their images burn indelibly and unequivocally upon the desensitized soul of America. The Hughes brothers take two outwardly amoral characters — the charismatic O-Dog (Larenz Tate) and the questioning Caine (Tyrin Turner), and show how their actions result not from stereotypes but from a culture of violence and a shattered society seemingly beyond repair. There's hope imbedded deep in Menace, but it is a hope continually out of reach for its characters, but not for its viewers. With the velocity of a vengeful bullet and the potency of a depth charge, Menace is hard to watch, but even harder to forget. (J.L.)

4. The Age of Innocence — Adapting Edith Wharton's tragic tale of misdirected destiny, implicit love and heavy-handed social contracts, Martin Scorsese has delivered one of the year's most moving period romances. Set in 1870s New York, Scorsese transplants his contemporary "goodfellas" among the echelons of high society where a well-placed word equals a sawed-off shotgun. The authentic Gotham locales add to rich, anguished performances by Daniel Day-Lewis and Michelle Pfeiffer as lovers defiant of their totalitarian class system. Wynona Ryder's well-sketched naivete exudes a clever knowingness as Lewis' loving fiancee, providing a deft brush stroke to an honest American masterpiece. (E.H.)

5. The Long Day Closes — If you blinked this summer, you missed Terence Davies' euphoric, breathlessly ethereal '50s memoir of his Liverpool childhood, continuing the tale begun with Distant Voices, Still Lives. A narrative fueled more by intricately constructed and innately sublime imagery than a series of pivotal events, Davies' illusory ode to his boyhood is portrayed as a dreamy, movie-fed existence. In Davies' world, religion is tied intrinsicly with movie-going, with people believing in the movies as absolutely as they believe in God. A stunner that pays off in numerous visual epiphanies, this is the story of an extinct history that never existed, and one that could only be preserved in the flickering pulse of the movies. (J.L.)

6. Much Ado About Nothing — Kenneth Branagh's incandescent take on Shakespeare's most enjoyable tale of love and mistaken identity set at a sun-drenched Italian villa, wears its unabashed romanticism on its sleeve, but so what? With an all-star cast (including the luminous Emma Thompson, the majestic Denzel Washington and a menacingly over the top Keanu Reeves) up for a grand old time, their deep, luminous tans evoking Shakespeare's more basic instincts, Branagh preserves the glory and biting vocal volleys in all their crowd-pleasing splendor. He concocts a vibrant, kinetic farce that is so wonderfully enjoyable you may just want to stand up and cheer. (J.L)

7. Dazed & Confused — Richard Linklater follows up his slyly astute Slacker by delving into deeper mines of comic irony with this hilariously dead-on portrait of '70s teenage life, capturing the last day of a Texas high school from the final bell to a killer keg party that evening. With a wit so sharp it cuts through the John Hughesian self-important angst of '80s teen flicks, Dazed also manages to skew the whiners and neo-stoners of Generation X. Led by Wiley Wiggins as a freshman-to-be coming of age, the cast is a collection of newcomers in a vibrantly played out story of growing up in a decade where kickin' back was less of an escape than a way of life. Coolly sarcastic and more revelatory that you'd think, Dazed has a lot to say about the '70s but just as much to say about today. (J.L.)

8. The Remains of the Day — Still in the afterglow (and shadow) of their previous success with Howards End, the folks from Merchant-Ivory, along with co-stars Anthony Hopkins and Emma Thompson, reunited for this profoundly resonate adaptation of Kazuo Ishiguro's 1989 novel of repressed love, unquestioning duty and missed opportunities. As the butler of Darlington Hall, a sprawling English estate, Hopkins (in a masterful turn) believes so strongly in his work it consumes his life and blinds him to the delicate affections of the estate's housekeeper (Thompson). Director James Ivory and screenwriter Ruth Prawer Jhabvala are in top creative form here, adding a polished luster to what could've been routine "Masterpiece Theatre." Hopkins' top-drawer performance is the key here, and the rest falls into perfectly manicured place. (J.L)

9. In the Line of Fire and Sommersby (tie) — Wolfgang Peterson's thriller transcends the thrill-ride mechanics of The Fugitive by cultivating a volatile relationship between Eastwood's worn Secret Service agent and John Malkovich's would-be assassin. Paying fond farewell to the JFK assassanation, this is an engaging study of two Cold War dinosaurs locked in combat over a nation's lost cause, set to the beat of a heart in the darkness.

Director Jon Aimel wisely shirks Hollywood romance conventions in Sommersby, delivering a quiet meditation on the power of movie love. Richard Gere and Jodie Foster realistically portray a returning tobacco farmer and his wife struggling to rebuild a marriage torn asunder by pre-Civil War domestic clashes. This is full blown, gone with the wind melodrama with all the stops pulled out, a love story haunted by tortured Southern reconstruction. (E.H.)

10. Jurassic Park — Steven Spielberg has always known how to tweak an audience. Here he perfects it. Every dino stomp and chomp is pumped up to magnum voltage in this energetic romp and raucous roll through the primeval ages, thanks to dazzling computer imagery by the wizards at Industrial Light and Magic. Spielberg takes his Jaws formula to the nth degree as his re-energized dinosaurs take on the 20th century with horrifying results. (First thing they do, kill all the lawyers.) Amid the roller-coaster suspense, David Koepp and Michael Crichton (adapting his novel) graft a witty indictment of thrill ride entertainment onto their tale of the ultimate theme ride gone berserk. THE REEL WORLD

Madonna, Arnold star in biggest turkeys

By JON LUPO & ED HUMPHRIES
Collegian Staff

1. Indecent Proposal— Despite its lurid premise and obvious star power, this is a piece of bottom-drawer garbage, a film so incredibly stupid only in America could it make over $100 million. In Adrian Lyne's dim-witted "women's film," Demi Moore gets to whine in sundresses with straw hats and show her breasts a lot (so much so they should be nominated for best supporting performance), Woody Harrelson gets to pout and talk about aspiring bricks and Robert Redford is allowed to slide by on charm left over from The Great Gatsby. With a shockingly infantile script and the most juvenile acting this side of a grammar school play, the most irritating thing about Indecent Proposal is that both the film (and the bulk of the audience) took this crap seriously. (J.L)

2. Body of Evidence— In this high camp porno flick played howlingly straight, Madonna tries to act again and the result is this silly, (eh-hem) overblown sex thriller that makes one wish for the inspired cinematic grace of Shanghai Surprise. Willem Dafoe and Joe Mantegna slum big time, and while it is fun to see the perennial dim Anne Archer call Madonna "a cokehead slut," the biggest achievement Evidence can claim is that the Material Girl elevates looking like a complete idiot an art form. (J.L.)

3. The Last Action Hero— Mt. Olympus has fallen! The mighty, indomitable action god Arnold Schwarzeggar finally stumbled big time in this caustic Jurassic lark from last summer. An action-comic take on The Purple Rose of Cairo, Hero tries to ape its 40-car pileup predecessors but one can't shake the nagging notion that this film would drop its faux-action comic pretensions in an instant for a well-oiled Uzi blast fest. Lethal Weapon hack Shane Black's script doesn't help matters, serving a flatulent mafioso don and a Danny Devito-voiced animated feline detective into the muddled mix. 'Nuff said. (E.H.)

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Sharon Stone

ASSOCIATED PRESS

4. Sliver— Sharon Stone's follow up to her breakthrough role in 1992's Basic Instinct is alas, more of the same. Billed as an erotic thriller, director Phillip Noyce delivers only one erotic thrill, a show-stopping voyeuristic journey through the lives of everyday people via his pervasive surveillance cameras. The problem? Joe Eszterhas' script treads closely on his Instinct ground and can't quite decide who its antagonist is. Three endings were filmed and it shows as the film's murky conclusion unfairly and illogically cops-out everything laid out before, playing straight into the hands of those influential preview audiences. (E.H.)

5. Amos and Andrew— Writer-director E. Max Frye may be seeking something wild in this comedy of misstrewn manners. All he finds is something offensive. When New England police mistake African-American writer Samuel L. Jackson for a common thief, they send in career criminal Nicholas Cage to repair the damage. Cage visits a dry well once too often for another innocuous unshaven bonehead, and the "bigotry is funny" notions in Frye's film boomerang from a script that re-invents racism as slapstick farce. Frye tries to lighten the sting while seeking socially grounding wit, but the stereotypical drafting of Jackson's character defeats any noble aspirations. (E.H.)

SOUNDS FROM THE

No rain on retro-hippie musical parade

Blind Melon rises to top with debut album

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

Ugh, cries the soul of the alternative journalist. Ugh, this is such a great album and I totally dig it and I totally dug it before everyone else dug it and now these guys are posing nude on the cover of Rolling Stone and getting swooned all over by alternachicks.

But it's time to swallow the pride.

Blind Melon is the best album of 1993 (though it may have actually been released in 1992, it's a matter of days) hands down.

No other work so adeptly took the work of its ancesters and built upon it with a completely new and genuine twist. Blind Melon did not try to put the square block inside the circular hole; they are completely circular.

Thanks in part to a retro-hippie type of feel, the push of the alternative mainstream marketing and a hefty dosage of airplay and MTV rotation, Blind Melon achieved success without compromising their abilities and in a way which took them completely by surprise.

When I spoke to Melon lead singer Shannon Hoon last spring, the band was playing before generally disinterested stadium crowds before headliners Guns n' Roses (a show which was supposed to come to Mullins but was cancelled by Guns on two occasions) took the stage. Their concoction of Allmans-type riffs and soulful vocals didn't always go down so well with the swarms of Axl-worshipping Beavises and Butt-Heads.

"If we play to 18,000 people and 100 of them get it, then that's great, it was worth it," said Hoon. Let's see, the album's sold a million or so copies, that means each of those 100 GNR fans bought 1,000 copies a piece.

Last spring, Hoon couldn't afford music to listen to on the road. "Someone's making money but it sure as hell isn't me. I'm poor," said Hoon. Poor? Alternative pin-up boy, poor!?

Well, Hoon's pockets are probably bulging a little more these days but it's money well earned. Blind Melon is a brilliant debut.

"Tones of Home" was a successful single and received some airplay, but it was the slow and charmingly unapologetic ballad "No Rain" which gave Blind Melon the boost they needed. With the help of the airwaves and cable TV, the five slackers from California began to conquer the musical world.

The album, which Hoon described as "a collage of moods," is brutally appealing. The lyrics aren't complex, but they manage to present universally interesting themes such as going home, simple pleasures and "Dear ol' Dad," which is not exactly complimentary.

At the heart of these unpretentious observations is a blazing musical backdrop. Like the Grateful Dead, the Allman Brothers and so many of their other predecessors, Blind Melon can jam. The often grooving and sometimes blazing guitarwork of Rogers Stevens and Christopher Thorn has a natural knack for clicking with Brad Smith's precise basslines and Glen Graham's always driving drumbeats.

"Paper Scratcher" and "Soak the Sin" exhibit the band's controlled grooves which accompany the power and feeling of Hoon.

"Sleepyhouse" is soulful and again establishes a strong and reliable groove. "No Rain" is just a flat-out good time. Though it's been played to death, the candid and naive lyrics are infectious.

In the case of Blind Melon, selling out has never been the case. They are five good musicians with a great debut. Breakout the bumblebee costume and find a field of flowers.

Honorable Mentions for Best Album of 1990 go to Mercury Rev, Boces; Smashing Pumpkins, Siamese Dream (though Gish was much better); Miranda Sex Garden, Suspiria; and Stereolab, Transient Random-Noise Bursts with Announcements.

A different approach to the music year in review

By BRIAN BABINEAU
Collegian Staff

Now that another year has unfurled in front of us, the time for reflection rears its head. In looking back at what happened in music in 1993, there are lots of events and people to consider. In trying to offset the normal tone of best and worst of the year columns, I have dug deep to suggest some bests and worsts, first and lasts of music in 1993 that you may not have thought of.

•Worst Album by a Group Pretending to be Alternative — Grave Dancers Union. Soul Asylum. These guys sound more like REO Speedwagon or Dan Fogelberg than anything remotely alternative.

•Best Album of Angstful Lyrics — Gentlemen. Afgan Whigs. Greg Dulli writes such angry lyrics that he makes Nine Inch Nails sound like Captain and Tenille.

•Worst Song Lyric — In U2's "Some Days Are Better Than Others," Bono sings: "...some days you can't stand the sight of a puppy." Huh? Sounds like he's writing for "Sesame Street" or something. Nice try, you rock stud.

•Best Cover Song — Pearl Jam ripping through "Rockin' in the Free World" with Neil Young for a good 10 or so minutes on MTV. Wow.

•Worst Song that Sounds Like a Cover — "Plush," Stone Temple Pilots. Now I know you thought it was Pearl Jam the first time you heard it too. Don't lie.

•First Rap Album Admittedly Liked by Pseudo-Hippies — Black Sunday. Cypress Hill. As song one says, "I wanna get high, so high..." Enough said.

•Most Overplayed Music Video — "Jeremy," Pearl Jam. I saw this video more times last spring than I saw my roommates. It was like having permanent Pearl Jam wallpaper.

•Best Name for a New Band — Armageddon Dildos. This name conjures up such a vivid image.

•Biggest Star to Wear Really Silly Make-Up — Bono on the Zooropa tour. A gold lame suit with white face paint, red lipstick and devil horns? Bono, Bono, Bono. Go back to jeans and T-shirts, okay? You're scaring me.

•Best Magazine Ad for an Album — Last Splash, Breeders. Just because it includes the quote: "Because half the fun of going to hell is getting there."

•Best Rap by a Guy with Red Hair — "Connected," Stereo MC's. Makes you think that Richie Cunningham grew a goatee, put on baggy jeans and made a career change.

•Worst Album to Listen to When Looking for an Adrenaline Rush — So Tonight That I Might See, Mazzy Star. This album makes you more mellow than a fistful of codeine. Towards the end, you'd swear you're asleep.

•Best Anti-Love Song — "Creep," Radiohead. A pretty little song until that guitar coughs in and the singer spits out: "...you're so f—ing special..."

•Most Unwelcome Musical Comeback — Depeche Mode and New Order. These guys used to epitomize progressive sound, but now find their miserable English synth-pop selves being trod on by the new flannel-coated, guitar-toting alterna-stars.

•Best Comeback by a Band — Velvet Underground. They toured Europe and gave a new generation a chance to experience the haunted, distorted foundation of progressive sound first-hand.

VALLEY... AND BEYOND

Year-end review highlights live music variety

By MATT AUDETTE
Collegian Staff

The Valley has always been a great source for a variety of live music and this year was no exception. From alternative to rap to metal, if you couldn't find something to tickle your fancy this year, than obviously you don't get out much. So as the curtain slowly draws shut and 1993 becomes but a mere memory, let us look back at some of the highlights (as well as dark spots) of this year's local music scene.

•Heavy metal gods Metallica kicked off the year when they blasted into the Mullins Center for a show that definitely would be Beavis and Butt-head approved. Complete with lights, explosions, crunchy chords and enough angst to satisfy even the most fickle metal fans, it was the stuff rock n' roll dreams are made of.

•In March, college rock favorites and University of Massachusetts alumni Buffalo Tom rolled into the Iron Horse for an evening of standard alternative music. From fuzzed-out rockers to the now-obligatory acoustic ballads it was clear that these guys had covered all the bases.

•All those who trudged home through the snow during spring break missed one of the finest rock shows to stop at the Iron Horse for quite some time, as Belly took the stage. Tanya Donnelly and company ripped through an energetic set (and looked quite cute doing it I might add) including their giant hit "Feed The Tree," which left the restless crowd pushing tables out of the way and bopping wildly to the music.

•Proving that even the cleverest of jokes usually wear thin quite fast, alternative jokers King Missile played Pearl Street in March. Riding high on their mundane single "Detachable Penis" (see there's this guy and he loses his penis...) the band subjected the audience to a gruelling set of lame jokes and boring prog-rock songs, quickly reducing the band to the likes of a second rate novelty act.

•Critics desperate for a new scene once Seattle went mainstream quickly pointed their finger at Northampton as the first annual Loud Music Festival rolled into town. With multiple venues hosting a wide array of talent such as My Bloody Valentine wanna-be's The Swirlies, Hypnolovewheel Cell and Gobblehoof, it was definitely one of the more interesting shows to come to the area this year.

•The underdog story of the year came from college rock weenies The Gin Blossoms whose jangly pop hit "Hey Jealousy" slowly crept its way on to the charts and into the heads of just about everyone in the country. Here's the punchline: the band played a very poorly attended, yet very free show in April at our very own Hatch. Teach you to ignore those flyers on the campus center bulletin boards.

•Pearl Street hosted two shows this year that represented one of the year's hottest trends: mixing hip hop with jazz. Digable Planets, who rode the idea straight into the Top 40 with their hit "Rebirth Of Slick," brought their version to the area in May. But it was Gang Starr frontman Guru who took the concept full circle when he and his Jazzmatazz entourage burned up Pearl Street's stage by using real jazz musicians, proving that there is nothing quite like the real thing.

•Ahhh, spring. The chirping of birds, the smell of flowers and, of course, the annual UMass Spring Concert. This year students were treated to a variety of sounds including the feedback-drenched Dinosaur Jr., reggae legends The Wailers and hip hop superstars Naughty By Nature. While the UPC should be commended for such an eclectic line-up, I would still like to meet the person who said, "I got it, Richie Havens!"

•The most retro show of the year came from Lenny Kravitz and Blind Melon who brought their "summer of love" derivative music to the Mullins Center in September. Complete with bell-bottoms, flares and good hippie vibes, it was living proof that the seventies are indeed making a comeback. God help us all.

•In October, sugar coated Seattle natives The Posies brought their easy to swallow melodies and guitar hooks to Pearl Street. While the music was definitely rooted in the 60s, the attitude was pure nineties. The only downfall of the show was opening act Dig who didn't have an original bone in their body. If this is the kind of junk we're going to get now that Nirvana and Smashing Pumpkins have hit it big, thanks but no thanks.

•Rap music is unfortunately not well represented in the valley but yet this year's best double bill came from hip hop veterans De La Soul and A Tribe Called Quest who both released amazing albums in 1993 and played in front of a packed house at Pearl Street. With the popularity of rap music at an all-time high and an obvious demand for more live shows, let's hope we see more in the coming year.

•The year's best show came surprisingly from Stereolab at Amherst College. The English band, which has been hyped to death by the press, quickly proved why they treated the disappointingly small audience to a mesmerizing set of dream-pop while looking like a futuristic version of the Partridge Family. Definitely cool.

•In a final note, 1993 was also a great year for two venues that are not usually included when one thinks of great live shows: our collegiate neighbors, Amherst College. This year, they boasted an impressive line-up which included Matthew Sweet, Bob Mould, Spin Docters, J. Mascis, They Might Be Giants and The Bay State Cabaret, who did an excellent job of supporting much of the local talent that the Amherst/Northampton area has to offer. Let's hope we see more in 1994.

That production's leading man was also the Best Director of the Best Production, the wonderful Hampden Theatre production of American Buffalo, staged by Nathan Schechter. A junkshop odyssey for three men in search of riches and recognition, Schechter's gritty, perfect treatment of this Mamet opus included a Best Supporting Actor turn from Paul Anthony Spatarella — the penny-ante crook in a buffalo nickel world, who undermines his own foolproof heist through greed and suspicion.

But the Biggest Surprise of the year was the first Theatre Guild musical in three years in which I could actually hear the singers over the din of the orchestra. The student group has finally learned to use orchestrations which underscore the vocals instead of concealing them. An equal surprise is the fact that I actually wanted to hear these singers: an ace cast, assembled for a stunning production of the Best Musical, Pippin.

In the hands of director Elise Schild, Stephen Schwartz's oh-so-1970s self-discovery musical became a crazy looking glass for the heterogeneous society of 1993. Homosexuality and feminism, ageism and safe sex, cartoon violence and mutton chops — all were blended together with the buzz and furor of a Persian bizarre, smack dab in the middle of the Holy Roman Empire.

Pippin also contains this year's second hysterical deadpan by Patrick Brennan, the murderous priest from The Mystery of Edwin Drood, who played Charlemagne the Great as the most absurdly deflated blowhard in Christendom. When Brennan speaks admiringly of his Burger King crown, or cries "Mutton chops for all!" in a voice of self-conscious benevolence, it is impossible not to laugh. It is for this reason that I present to Brennan our final award, and the Collegian's greatest honor: The Award for Outstanding Achievement In the Field of Just Generally Being The Coolest Life Form On Earth, If Not The Universe. It's an award as deliciously self-important as most of Brennan's characters.

•Best Quote About a Band — An ad for the Velvet Underground's new live album reads: "It is said that this band had a few hundred fans — and all of them started bands." Pretty deep truth for an ad.

There it is. (Don't you dare say "whoomp.") This has been a progressively interesting year in music, and next year can only get better. At least it can't get worse (think of when Bon Jovi and Poison ruled the airwaves.) We of the MTV generation are moving the music scene in a much more exciting direction, so enjoy it next time you are watching a Nirvana or Smashing Pumpkins video, and anyway, you forget exactly what Bon Jovi looks like.

blow. Scorsese's Age of Innocence not only became the inspiration for the Renaissance of the Victorian Era, but also introduced a new sex toy: gloves. Unbridles passion and bustiers in crimson velvet and silk peaked demurely out of Edwardian styled jackets and vests. Lace dripped and fake fur shed all over the place, adding romantic spice to clothes found in great-grandma's hope chest. Once again, Lauren seizes the moment by creating his Russia collection, sure to captured the rustic nostalgia of Imperial Russia.

The even en vogue spy coat reappeared, along with the durable Navy pea coat. Models slouched and slinked in proper sleuth style making one wonder if Dick Tracy II might hit the theaters (after all, Honey, I Shrunk the Kids got a second chance).

Yes, 1993 did have its little basket of tricks and twists, but all in all it was a pretty versatile year for those looking to personalize themselves or save a buck by borrowing from your parents or great aunt Edna. So, sort through your clothes, laugh at your faux pas and cry over those clogs. Reminisce and sigh, then shrink back in horror because there's a whole new wardrobe to deal with in 1994.

This is the garbage I spoke of. I spent my money on this? The only positive thing about True Romance is Patricia Arquette is a babe. And there were worse movies in 1993.

Music's the same. There were plenty of great releases. Regrettably they were clouded by phonies like Stone Temple Pilots, fake emotionalists like Pearl Jam and woman abusers like Tag Team. Before you go around saying "Whoomp! There it is," find out what it means. Excess hair dye, excess emotion, excess idiocy.

Hopefully Hollywood and music industry can take note of their past successes. Casablanca, Harry and Tonto, the Grateful Dead, Bob Marley — there's a place for excess, but you don't always have to yell to make a point.

Changes on tap for admissions policies

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

Following the exposure of a student on campus guilty of rape, University of Massachusetts officials are debating ways to change admissions policies and procedures.

Zaigham K. Khan, 23, of Pakistan, enrolled at the University this semester as a transfer student from Gettysburg College. He was found guilty by a jury of two counts of rape and five counts of indecent assault after his acceptance to the University. He is appealing the decision, with a hearing date set for Dec. 30.

"We need to be reviewing the information we ask incoming students," said Jo-Anne Vanin, dean of students, "as well as how we should pursue the information we receive."

Khan's student status is being reviewed, according to Tom Robinson, vice chancellor for student affairs.

Several meetings are in progress to discuss what steps can be taken to be more aware of incoming students' backgrounds.

"In terms of looking at procedures," Robinson said, "there have been on-going meetings since Monday with staff, the director of admissions and others to look at policy."

University officials began discussions when The Collegian began interviews for the story on Khan, according to Robinson. The article was published on Tuesday.

Through discussions, Robinson said he hopes to "coordinate a more effective admissions process so we can make a good match of those students would like to be here and those students we would like to have here."

Arlene Cash, director of admissions, said she is ordering a book, Managing Admissions and the Law, to use as a reference for restructuring the admissions process.

She said the Admissions Office will be surveying other colleges and universities to see how they inquire into incoming students' backgrounds.

She also said a school cannot require a student to furnish criminal history, especially if the student has already served time.

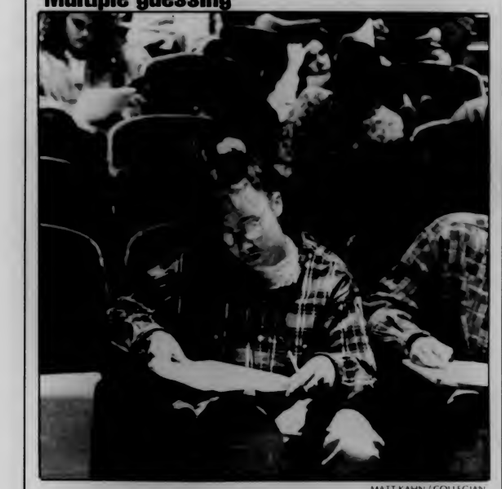
Any changes made on the admissions application must be approved outside of the Amherst campus, according to Karin Sherbin, campus spokesperson.

The application is used by all five campuses of the University of Massachusetts system, and any changes must be approved. Sherbin was not sure who would approve the change, possibly the University Board of Trustees.

"The President's Office is concerned," said Cash, "because this is a major issue for all recruitment in the [UMass] system."

Robinson said the University could implement some policies to check into applicants' background without approval outside of the Amherst campus.

"We could have transfer applicants sign a waiver for the University to get clearance to check into students' backgrounds at previous institutions."



Although he said this check could begin now, Robinson said officials are discussing what changes are appropriate.

"This situation never developed before," he said, "But now that it came to light, we need to rethink our policy. With a new admissions director, it is all the more reason to rethink the old way.

"Overall, Cash said the response by University officials has been "positive." She said everyone is very concerned about the issues raised by Khan's enrollment and does not consider this "just one guy."

Cash said the problem facing the University when trying to rework admissions procedures is how to protect the rights and privacy of students, while being aware of students' pasts.

Computers see new life through recycling plan

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

For the past three years, pieces of old and broken computers have been piled up in a corner of the recycling facility at the University of Massachusetts.

Yet with the ideas and persistence of R. Marc Fournier, UMass now has a new computer recycling program to help solve this problem.

When Fournier first started working at the University, he immediately stopped the process of dumping old typewriters, televisions, printers and terminals at the UMass recycling facility on East Pleasant Street.

"I had a vision for the future that markets would develop to handle computer recyclable parts," said Fournier, University of Massachusetts solid waste director.

The program was put into practice in the beginning of the semester.

UMass work study students were hired to start to disassemble the parts.

"Three years ago, I noticed a lot of computer materials that were being thrown away. I knew what the computers were made of and that it was recyclable," Fournier said.

The Electronics Processing Associates of the Lowell helped the University of Massachusetts in designing this new program.

Fournier hired the firm to help sketch out a plan in which the computers could be taken apart and either recycle the parts or have some of the parts marketed.

"We asked the Electronics Processing Associates to help us put the system together to make it more effective. They are a firm who has a lot of experience. They helped us figure out which articles were the best to sell," Fournier said.

Computers will be broken down into their basic components. Recyclable materials such as gold, lead, cadmium and silver will be saved. Also glass and plastic will be economized.

Several parts will also be sold to companies. Selected materials will be melted down. Other parts will be recycled to be used again.

Fournier said this will be done to avoid throwing away toxic materials.

"There are many natural resources that can be reused," he said.

The program has several goals. The initial goal was aimed to recycle valuable materials. Other goals have stemmed from that.

"We have several goals in mind. We want to create economic development and provide recycling service to local schools," Fournier said.

"This program will also create jobs for students on work study and developmentally disabled people. This will also help create new businesses," he said.

SGA unveils new plans

Spring will bring lobbying against state

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association plan to spend the spring semester fighting to control tuition and fees and lobbying the Massachusetts State House for a higher appropriation and larger financial aid pool for the five-university system, the student coordinator of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) said.

SCERA Student Coordinator Lynn Robitaille said the SGA has set up a task force called "The Task Force on Economic Accessibility at UMass" to lobby the Board of Trustees, state legislators and the upper administration of the University.

Robitaille said the job of the task force is to convince the Board of Trustees, the group responsible for increasing or decreasing tuition, that the University is too expensive to be accessible to all students.

"They need to be made aware of the fact that for many students in Massachusetts, UMass is not accessible," Robitaille said. "There are a lot of students in cities such as Springfield, Lowell, Worcester and Lawrence who can't afford to come here, and that's not right."

Robitaille said the SGA hopes to convince state legislators to increase the state's appropriation for the five colleges by $23.8 million, a 7.1 percent increase from last year's appropriation. She also said, however, that even if a higher

Clinton administration tackles problems of teen pregnancies

By JENNIFER DIXON
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Teenage mothers would have to live with their parents to qualify for public assistance under a draft White House proposal to overhaul the nation's welfare system and discourage out-of-wedlock births.

The idea is one of s veral that President Clinton's welfare reform task force is considering to address the rapidly increasing number of births to single women.

The group also seeks to translate the president's campaign promise to "end welfare as we know it" into a plan to impose a two-year limit on welfare benefits while expanding education, training and child care for low-income families.

The 29-page draft does not address the cost of reform, how it would be financed, and the number of jobs that would have to be created for parents who reach the two-year time limit and are unable to find work.

A senior administrative official, speaking on condition of anoninity, said the task force won't get to the specifics of financing the overhaul until other policy decisions are made, such as how the plan would be phased in and who would be exempt from the work requirements.

The official said the administration would pay for any new investments

Here comes Santa Claus

Santa Claus and Mrs. Claus will be visiting the children of North Village and Lincoln Apartments a little early this year. On December 11, the children of these complexes will get treats and have the opportunity to have their pictures taken with the family from the North Pole.

The happy couple will arrive in the parking lot and community room of Lincoln at 10 a.m. They will hit North Village at 11 a.m. Mounted police and bike patrols will be on hand to assist and the entire university community is invited to attend.

Winterfest Socials will also be held in both places on that day from 2 p.m. to 6 p.m. Various holidays such as Christmas, Hannukah, the Feast of the Epiphany/Three Kings Day, Kwanza and Winter Solstice will be commemorated through storyboards and decorations.

This visit is co-sponsored by the Division of Public Safety and Family Housing. Santa and Mrs. Claus will be played by housing security officer, Charles Genza and his wife, Mary Ann.

"Green Business" emerges with Olver's help

U.S. Rep. John W. Olver will be co-sponsoring and Environmental Business Conference at UMass on Dec. 13. It will be a day-long program that will highlight resources available to environmental businesses through the University, the federal government and the private sector.

Olver said he hopes to put central and western Massachusetts back to work through the environmental industry. He has identified a list of over 100 environmental companies in the First District and those companies are all invited to attend the conference.

Professor elected to top post

Eammon Bach, professor emeritus in the department of linguistics will serve on the executive committee of the Linguistics Society of America. He will be vice-president for one year before becoming president in January 1995.

Bach was nominated for his work in syntax and semantics in languages. He studies Haisla, an endangered language spoken Native Canadians in British Columbia. He also works with American Sign Language. He is the second faculty member to be named to the post. His wife, Barbara H. Partee, was selected in 1985. This is indeed a binary accomplishment.

Sociology prof earns grant

A professor in the department of sociology has been awarded the Fulbright grant for research in New Delhi, India. Nicholas J. Demerath III. He will do research at the Delhi University and the Jawarharlal Nehru University under the Indo-American Fellowship Program. He is doing a comparative project to detect the shift in power between world religions and world politics.

Trade with Mexico increasing

Exports from Massachusetts to Mexico are up 164 percent since 1987. Last year the Bay State shipped $264 million in goods, according to the Massachusetts Institute for Social and Economic Research (MISER) at UMass.

The six New England states exported $664 million in goods in 1992, an increase of 171 percent. The top exports were industrial machinery and computers, scientific and measuring instruments, and electric and electronic equipment.

George Treyz, a professor of economics at the University took this data to estimate that about 5,000 jobs in the state depend directly on exports to Mexico.

Graduation becomes a bit easier

Change of requirements set for economics majors

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

Last week a new rule was passed in the economics department for all students in the major.

Previously, the rule required economic majors to obtain a grade of C or better in particular courses to remain in the major.

Now the rule requires students to have a GPA of 2.0 or higher from a certain group of courses.

These courses include pre-major classes for economics as well as classes from other departments that are included in the prerequisite requirements.

"The exact rule depends on which of two options the student chooses," said James Kindahl, professor of economics and director of undergraduate studies.

Kindahl said many students are planning to retake courses in which they received a C or C/D.

According to Kindahl, some students are registered to repeat the class either next semester or over intersession in order to replace their lower grade with a higher one.

Kindahl said he wants to, "get the message out," to those students who are in this situation and to help them to check out these new rules.

"If you have been planning to repeat a course to obtain a C or better to satisfy economics department rules, go to the Undergraduate Office, Thompson 1004 to get a handout sheet detailing the new rules," Kindahl said.

The economics department wants students to be aware of this new rule in order for them to avoid spending money on a course they do not have to retake.

"You may well find that you do not need to repeat a course," Kindahl said.

New EWC program welcomed

By NICOLE BURKE

REBECCA PETERSON / COLLEGIAN

Last night in the Campus Center, the Everywoman's Center held an informal reception for their recently established Women of Color Program.

"Tonight is a gathering for the women of color to find the ways in which we can connect with each other and share resources," said Lisa Scott Crump, the program coordinator for the Women of Color Program. "The program's purpose is to bring women of color from on and off campus together in one place."

The Women of Color Program began this semester after the EWC received a grant from the Civility Commission on Human Relations in the Chancellor's Department. The first reception was designed to bring students, professors and university workers together to meet other women of color with the same interests, concerns, and feelings.

"I hope that this reception will create an awareness of women of color on campus," Kathye Castaneda, an EWC Educator/ Advocate counselor said. "It is really important for women of color to create a network to communicate with. We need to share and learn from each other's experiences."

Fellow EWC Educator/Advocate counselor, Angela Gabriel agreed. "This reception is great because this is the first time since I've been on campus that women of color can finally get together and be able to relate to each other. Sometimes I think that women of color are excluded and not often recognized. We want to change that."

The Women of Color Program encouraged the group to sign-up for various activities such as book clubs, weekend retreats and support groups. The Program hopes to establish these activities next semester.

"Tonight's reception is a place to make connections with other women of color in case we want to set up support groups and events," Fanny Bonilla, a sophomore education and Spanish major said. "If we need outside help other than the EWC, women of color can find it here."

Irma Gonzalez, coordinator for the Educator/Advocate program at the EWC said she hoped last night's reception would bring more women of color together.

"Bringing women to the EWC in this way is important," she said. "It makes an incredible difference for women of color to have a big enough group because we all have something in common that is powerful."

Any woman who would like to learn more about the Women of Color Program at the EWC can call Wilder Hall at 545-0883.

"The Women of Color Program is an environment where we feel comfortable talking about specific issues," Crump said. "We must continue to create these types of environments so that this feeling we have now continues."

Job market need not be scary

Program provides mentors for students to learn from

By TRACEY DALZELL
Collegian Correspondent

The opportunity for people to learn more about a profession when choosing or advancing a career has been offered in the form of a new mentor-by-mail program.

The Learners and Mentors Program by Post, Inc. (LAMPPOST, Inc.), is a non-profit organization which is universally accessible. The program matches learners over the age of 15 (high school and college students, trainees, unemployed and underemployed persons) with screened adult mentors (professionals, skilled workers, retirees) according to their individual needs and preferences.

Learners can ask questions and seek advice about specific careers while mentors try to answer the questions as well as offering encouragement and serving as a successful role model.

Once matched, the pair agree to correspond at least once per month for a minimum of one year, according to the program's organizer. They may correspond for as long as they want the relationship to last.

"Learning (and mentoring) by mail has several remarkable, beneficial attributes," Julia Riley, executive director, said. "The interaction is inexpensive and available to anyone, anywhere, who can communicate by letter or audiotape. Writing and reading letters will help improve literacy and all exchanged messages are permanent and private. Each pair can communicate with each other at their convenience, in a relaxed and thoughtful manner."

Unlike other mentor programs, LAMPPOST, Inc. deliberately matches people who live far from each other. The main reason for this is that it eliminates the problem of trying to associate in person when there are hectic schedules involved. it also reduces any possibility of awkward or inappropriate social interactions. The participants develop a helpful, supportive relationship through written correspondence.

"Many superb face-to-face mentoring efforts exist, such as Big Brothers/Big Sisters, MENTOR and WomenCare, but an immense need remains for a non-traditional service like this to assist and involve the thousands of people unable to take advantage of other programs," Riley said.

Riley said the program encourages well-educated, skilled adults who may not have the time or physical capacity to join any other mentoring program to participate as a mentor-by-mail. Learners and mentors with disabilities are especially encouraged to take part.

Mentors may assist up to three learners per year and the service cost for each participant is $10 ($5 for a second or third learner match requested by a mentor).

in education, training and child care by wringing savings from federal entitlement programs. "It would pay as you go."

The task force calls teen pregnancy "an enduring tragedy" and notes that the country is approaching the point when one out of every three babies will be born to an unwed mother.

The costs are enormous, according to the Center for Population Options, an advocacy and research organization that estimates the federal government spent $29 billion in 1991 to support families begun by teenagers, up from $25 billion in 1990.

A significant reason for the increase is that an increasing percentage of teens births are out of wedlock.

An enemy of the people

Last week President Clinton signed into law the Brady bill which requires a five-day waiting period before the purchase of a gun. The five days would be used to do a background check on the buyer to see if they have committed a felony or have a history of mental illness. This makes sense, law-abiding citizens of this country don't want felons and lunatics to be able to walk into a store and buy a gun, do we? The NRA does.

ALEX
KENNEDY

The NRA (National Rifle Association) is ostensibly an organization which protects the rights of hunters but its real money comes from gun manufacturers for whom it lobbies. The NRA opposes any form of gun control and helped delay passage of the Brady bill for seven years. How does the NRA justify its campaign for the right of felons and mental patients to legally buy guns?

1.A waiting period won't stop crime completely so we shouldn't have it at all.

The NRA tries to argue that because murders continue to take place in states that already have waiting periods, waiting periods don't work. Similar logic would say since murders continue to take place in states which increase police forces, increased police forces don't work. But we all know that more, not less police officers are needed. Will more cops on the street stop crime completely? Of course not. Neither will the Brady bill. What the Brady bill will do is make it more difficult for dangerous people to buy guns.

2.Getting any kind of gun anytime I want is a constitutional right.

The NRA wouldn't know the Bill of Rights form a bill of sale and they expose their ignorance by claiming the bill violates the Second Amendment: "A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

The NRA conveniently ignores the first part of this sentence which is a lot like if a doctor told you, "If you are sick take medicine," and you took medicine regardless of your health. A well-regulated militia is no longer necessary for the security of a free state. In 1993, there are no citizen militias. That's why we have the Army and National Guard. The premise upon which the right of citizens to own guns was predicated no longer exists.

3.The Brady bill will deprive law-abiding citizens of guns and only criminals will be able to get guns.

What the Brady bill does is deprive people who don't already own a gun from committing a spur-of-the-moment crime of passion which is what most gun murders amount to. But criminals can still get guns illegally the NRA shrieks. This is true. The Brady bill does not prevent someone from buying a gun illegally. However, at least now the government doesn't have to be an accessory to countless murders by allowing people to legally buy guns who are clearly unfit to do so.

Now that we've exposed the shallowness of the NRA's public arguments, one has to wonder: what is the motivation behind the NRA's opposition to any restrictions on guns? In a word, greed. The NRA gets most of its money from and lobbies for gun manufacturers. If felons, mental patients, or the jilted lovers who goes temporarily insane can't buy guns, gun manufacturers lose money, and the NRA loses money and influence. The NRA is funded by blood money and serves as "muscle" for gun makers. The NRA should be recognized for what it is: an enemy of the people.

Clinton's family values

Just when you thought it was safe to go back in the water..."family values" are back in the spotlight in Washington.

President Clinton, fresh off his NAFTA victory and the symbolic finger flipped at the NRA with the Brady bill's passage, has turned some of his attention to welfare reform.

In a Newsweek interview last week, Clinton was asked if he believes it's immoral for people to have children out of wedlock. Clinton pointed out that to have a baby rather than an abortion is considered a moral decision, so he stopped short of saying that everyone who had a baby out of wedlock is immoral.

DEREK MILOSAVLJEVIC

The general impression Clinton gave however, was that he disapproved of illegitimate children. "I believe this country would be a lot better off if children were born to married couples," Clinton said.

Knowing full well that his comments could anger the many thousands of single mothers in the country, Bill, ever the shrewd politician, made the standard move of pointing out another expert with a similar opinion. Certainly much to his advisors' glee, Clinton cited a now famous address. "Remember the Dan Quayle speech," asked Clinton, referring to Quayle's controversial "family values" remarks which targeted fictional television reporter Murphy Brown. "There were a lot of very good things in that speech," the President said.

My, what a touching display of bipartisan ignorance. Republican and Democrat banded together to attack America's no. 1 enemy, the evil unwed mother.

Bill Clinton is no Dan Quayle, however. The President distanced himself from Quayle's opinion on Murphy. "The Murphy Brown thing was a mistake. . .because this woman is not symbolic of the real problem in society," Clinton said. Well of course she isn't. Murphy is white, educated and rich. There's no problem there.

The message Clinton is sending seems clear. Morality only applies to those below the poverty line. Murphy Brown, Marla Maples and all of Clinton's Hollywood buddies are exempt from the impending morality police. It is the inner-city, the minority, the poor mother who is the target of his crusade.

Why does Clinton believe the world would be such a shiny happy place without unwed mothers? Statistics show illegitimate children having tremendously higher rates of criminal activity, drug abuse, and welfare dependency than those of their counterparts in DonnaReedLand.

Can I get a "Duh?" Clearly, these problems are inner-city epidemics, each one dependent on the other. Unwed mothers haven't caused the crime and drug abuse problems, they are are all just products of the apathy the government has shown to the inner-cities, the poor, and especially minorities.

Some may think it doesn't matter what Clinton thinks about unwed motherhood, he won't change the fact that it exists. This may be true, but by condemning it as one of the major problems of our society he also condemns the children. Most of these children face tough enough lives without the added stigma the President wants attached to their "illegitimacy."

Even worse, one White House staff member was quoted as saying he would like to see the practice of denying welfare to anyone who had a child out of wedlock "tried somewhere — just to see, y'know, what might happen." Clinton has decided this would be morally wrong (so many morals, so little time). But the fact that such a policy would even be considered is frightening.

Here's hoping Bill spends the new year working on a policy that will improve the lives and self-esteem of welfare recipients and unwed mothers, and not further stigmatize them with misguided morality.

The real meaning of Hannukah

In yesterday's Collegian, Geri Sahn wrote of the "miracle of Hannukah." The oil that was supposed to last one day lasted for eight, and that the Maccabeans victory over the Syrians helped to bring about this miracle. However, if there is one thing I remember from Hebrew school as a boy, it is that the real miracle is that the few defeated the many, against all odds.

Of course, the oil lasting for over a week was a miraculous occurrence, but Mrs. Ginsburg would never have conceded that this is the reason that we celebrate Hannukah. We celebrate because in a time of complete despair, hope prevailed over all, and the few defeated the many. Happy Hannukah.

Don't like the ad? Turn the page

I'd like to make it perfectly clear that I am against the exploitation or sexual objectification of men and women alike. Now that that's settled, I would like to comment on the article, "Cold reality of a nude dancer" [Collegian, Dec. 8]. First of all, it is time to relax about these so-called degrading advertisements. If you don't like the ad, don't look at it! Freedom of speech is a part of what this country is all about. In order to have this right, you have to expect to see and hear both the good and the bad. How about page 15 of the same issue? Oh my, a fully nude man used in a real estate ad! I wasn't too happy about it so I flipped the page. These ads for Anthony's Pub have never shown any nudity.

The writer of the article was a stripper hell-bent to get the Collegian to stop running these ads. They supposedly tell the male population that female sexual exploitation is just as good as a bowl of Wheaties. Please. She spent a total of eight months in the stripping field. She said she would feel sick and degraded when her "audience" waved dollar bills in her direction so she would do little tricks for them like a caged monkey.

Let me ask this, if she knew the job made her feel sick and degraded, then why did she continue working for eight months? Why did she quit her nursing job to concentrate on her bar work? It doesn't take a rocket scientist to see that shredding clothing was not the answer for her. Maybe her stripping career did have a lasting, negative effect on her self-esteem. However, I don't want to hear that she was forced into it by a male-controlled society filled with sexist undertones. She chose to strip and quit her nursing job. That was completely her prerogative.

It sounds to me like she didn't mind the monetary aspect of the business (much of which came at the expense of the "degrading" ads in the papers).

I'm not in favor of the stripping profession or the ads, but please don't have the audacity to try to hide strippings' existence, especially if you have already bilked it for some of what it is worth (thanks in part to the very advertisement you disdain).

J. Rich spreads cheer

Store's ornament helps AIDS battle

By KRISTIN ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

As the holidays roll in, the giving spirit comes with the celebrations. This year, through J. Rich Clothing, someone can give more than a gift to that special someone.

For the second year in a row, J. Rich will be selling an ornament with proceeds going to American Foundation for AIDS Research (AMFAR) and AIDS CARE - Hampshire County. The ornament, a clear glass sphere with a red ribbon floating inside and "Miracles Happen" inscribed on the front, is part of an effort by Don't Panic Designs. The San Francisco based T-shirt company introduced the ornament a year ago as an effort to raise money for AIDS research.

"It could, and should, be up all year round," said Joseph Rich, owner of J. Rich Clothing based in Northampton and here in Amherst.

Last year, Rich sold 300 of the ornaments, more than expected. As with this year, he will be giving part of the proceeds to the AIDS CARE — Hampshire County, a multi-agency program.

"There's a lot of money being directed to education...but not a lot of money is going to people inflicted with this deadly disease," Rich said about his decision of where the money from the ornaments would go.

"We are continually grateful for the J. Rich donation," Reed Ide, director of AIDS CARE, said. "I think it's great when someone from the community makes an effort to help out."

Ide said the money from J. Rich will go towards a volunteer program in which a person who has AIDS or HIV virus will be paired with someone from the community. According to Ide, this "buddy program" provides emotional and practical support for those who need it.

"The community response to this program is excellent," Ide said.

The buddy will take his/her partner out to the doctor, shopping or even to the movies if they want. Ide said the community response has been great for this program. He's especially grateful for the large number of people who stay in the extensive training program "buddies" go through.

Those interested in becoming involved with the AIDS CARE buddy program contact Valerie Nelson, the program coordinator at 586-8288.

Infamous drum master Olatunji to play UMass

Babatunde Olatunji is heralded as one of the world's greatest drum masters.

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

Perhaps the most effective way to relate Babatunde Olatunji to the earthy-crunchers of the Happy Valley is to tell them he is the reason the Grateful Dead's Mickey Hart plays drums.

Hart wasn't the only one greatly moved by African drum-master Olatunji's 1959 release Drums of Passion. The album was the first to introduce African music to Western society. Performance opportunities opened up for Olatunji at Radio City Music Hall, the 1964 New York World's Fair and television's "Tonight Show."

Since then, the Nigerian-born Olatunji has gone on to open for the Dead, perform extensively on his own and record two critically raved about albums for Rykodisc records.

Babatunde Olatunji brings his spiritual and inspiring formula to UMass this Saturday in a University Productions and Concerts (UPC) presentation.

Affectionately referred to as "Baba" by his fans, Olatunji's U.S. following is substantial - comprised of Deadheads and a broad array of those appreciative of legitimate and moving music.

"Baba" and his Drums of Passion play the Student Union Ballroom tomorrow night with opening band (pretty decent drum-masters in their own right) Synasthesia. Tix are $8 for UMass students, $10 for others.

Final sounds ring out

Now the Christmas season has leapt upon us, perhaps there is one special alternative music lover on your list for whom you would like to purchase a particular disk or two. No doubt this person has a wish list chock full of Nirvana, Breeders and the like. Why not give this person a dose of the true roots of alternative music, and buy them one of the albums who inspired the musicians on their list?

SOUNDS FROM THE VALLEY

The Clash's "London Calling" is as good a place to start as any, with those reggae-ska-punk tunes filled with angst and anger. Of course, what would punk music have been without Johnny Rotten screaming "I am the anti-christ" on The Sex Pistols Never Mind the Bollocks? The influences of Patti Smith's timeless "Horses" can be traced through to Belly and the Breeders. Other worthies include X's Los Angeles, and any album by the Buzzcocks, The dB's, or, of course The Velvet Underground. So give your friends a little history, and show them what real alternative music is.

The best song title I've heard in awhile is Dead Can Dance's haunting "The Ubiquitous Mr. Lovegrove;" perhaps the first song ever to chart with the word "ubiquitous" in it.

Over January, if you are feeling trapped in the cage of a cold New England winter, there is one cure. A healthy dose of ska-legends English Beat or up and comers Bim Skala Bim, who play music made for summertime, can help you at least dream about warmer climes.

Some people may wonder why I am so intent on reviving the '80s through this space. If for no other reason, it's to give jobs back to such icons as Molly "Dig My Lips" Ringwald and Andrew "I Have Perfected the Angstful Stare" McCarthy, who personified the '80s as much as the Thompson Twins or Echo and The Bunnymen...

If you had the best orgasm of your life, would you tell someone about it? Don't worry, this isn't an infomercial. I have however reached a higher plane thanks to Stereolab's Transient Random-Noise Bursts with Announcements and a few deep breaths (nudge, nudge, wink, wink, say no more). The repetition, Laetitia Sadier's angelic and mesmerizing vocals, insistent little samples this is highly recommended magic.

Take a step forward and back and pickup the The Samples first and most recent albums. Thanks to an industrious move by America's most ecologically sound record label, What Are Records? (W.A.R.?), the Colorado-based jam-masters' self-titled first album has been rereleased. The Last Drag, The Samples' 1993 release is also available. These are some of the most harmonious and listenable tunes anywhere. Dude, this is sweet...

For the latter of these two columnists, this is probably the last you'll see of him in this paper for a while. Big thanks for the warm response we've received this semester. Hopefully, the column will be just as swell in the spring. I'd like to leave with a couple of transient random-thoughts...

Pavement and Unrest aren't that good despite the cults which worship them as alternative deities. They write okay tunes, decent lyrics. Integrity must go a long way...

If you're trying to talk to a person at a really loud show, cover his/her ear and try again. You'd be surprised with the results.

I love Blind Melon, especially "No Rain" and I'm proud of it. I don't care if people with B.U.M. Equipment like it too. You just can't fight that warm and fuzzy feeling that only fresh laundry, Barney, and great music can provide. Happy holidays!

Sex, drugs, rock & roll

Bogosian presents American pasttimes

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

While monologist Eric Bogosian crosses the country in his latest one man show, a UMass production will be bringing new life to his most popular stage success.

Sex, Drugs, Rock and Roll, Bogosian's scathing play about America's favorite pasttimes, settled into Hampden Theatre last night, in a new production directed by Benjamin Ware (Bedroom Farce). Fresh from his performance in Pippin, actor Craig Doescher faces the daunting task of bringing to life all of Bogosian's quirky heroes, using only voice and movement.

The dramatis personae includes a slick, barstool Romeo who is amazingly "endowed," a shallow rock musician endorsing an equally shallow fundraiser and a subway panhandler with a yen for "prescription drugs." There is also a frenetic music executive cultivating an ulcer over the phone, a doctor whose patients encounter side effects from bleeding sores to blindness (his prescription for hair loss is "a hat"), and an anal compulsive vagrant, who traces the great chain of filth, from dog excrement and vomit to Ukranian restaurants and Nutrasweet.

Although many of these sketches have grim overtones, Bogosian holds his reputation as a social commentator in low regard.

"I'm the cutting edge of the black hole of the American Psyche," he joked in his latest Bay State engagement. "I read it in the Boston Phoenix."

What makes Bogosian's shows exceptional is the rich and abundant humor that he can find, in everything from drug rehabilitation to executive narcissism. Those who want to brood on the moral laxity of society, can stay in their rooms and do so. Those who'd like laugh at it for a change can go to Hampden Theatre.

Sex, Drugs, Rock and Roll continues through Dec. 11 at Hampden Theatre, Southwest. All shows are at 8:00 pm.

Dr. Laz and the CURE, a Chassidic/Black rap group, out of Crown Heights Brooklyn, performed as part of a Channukah/Kwanza celebration brought to UMass by Hillel and the Black Mass Communications Project.

A Channukah/Kwanza party at the Hillel House kicked off the celebration on a positive note.

Michelle Cannon from BMCP talked about the meaning of Kwanza and Yocheved Adelman from the Chabad House talked about Channukah.

The leaders of Project CURE are UMass alumnus, Reverend Paul Chandler an African American Baptist Minister and Dr. David Lazerson, a Chassidic Rabbi.

CURE members are two dancers, Yudi Simon and T.J. Moses, and a diverse band.

Musicians in the band are a guitarist from Queens, Yossi Botnik, a drummer from Chicago, Bernice Brooks, a keyboardist from South Africa, Auremi G. and an Egyptian saxaphonist.

The music ranged from "Jewish Blues" to acoustic to rap with every musical element in between.

Reverend Chandler remarked on the mix of musical styles, saying that the Powerful Alternative, hardcore

Velvet Voodoo Dolls, Cameron's Way jam Pearl St.

By RYAN THOMAS
Collegian Correspondent

Cameron's Way &
Velvet Voodoo Dolls
Pearl Street
Dec. 7, 1993

Some local rockers showed off their talents at Pearl Street Tuesday night, creating an atmosphere of powerful, indulgent music. The groups were a diverse quintuplet that brought many different styles to the crowd.

Leading off the night was Tempered Son, a group who's chorus-drowned guitar work and stern vocals seemed to liquefy the room.

Songs such as "Girlie Song" and "Waterfall" were bright and lively, but filled with a meaningful undercurrent.

The band was extremely well organized and had an unmistakable working ability, producing a sound very much like the Philadelphia based band,Live.

Next up was Pangloss, a punkrock-hardcore ensemble who brought rough chords and deep wailing vocals to the air. With a singer who was at least six-foot-five, it was hard to look away. Best of all was their kooky rendition of Belly's "Feed the Trees". It stank, but everybody loved it.

Rapid Symphony took the stage next, and tore through a set of screeching guitar solos and low brooding keyboards. The lead vocalist came close to shattering the windows with his high pitched voice, which ranked up there with Iron Maiden's lead.

This might explain why they sounded a lot like such groups as Iron Maiden and Queensryche. Sadly enough, it was a mistake to have been booked on this night; they were out of place.

It wasn't until Cameron's Way hit the stage that the crowd really seemed to get into it, though. With their raw, crunching guitar riffs and speedy drumbeats, they had a mystical hold over the audience.

Their powerhouse music was a combination of hardcore and alternative that was reminiscent of such acts as Fugazi and Alice in Chains.

They jumped and kicked and danced on stage, playing for themselves as much as for the crowd. They gave a grade "A" performance that was extremely impressive.

Closing out the night was the Velvet Voodoo Dolls. It was set consisting of inspirational sound that had the audience bouncing. They played well and were just right to end the night with.

music they play is "Not just Jewish music, it's our music. People try to put us into little pockets, but music is universal."

"We have learned a lot of lessons [in this group]. One that rises to the surface is that any differences we have are very small."

The motto of Dr. Laz and the CURE is "Increase the Peace" with Communication, Understanding and Respect through Education, hence the acronym CURE. Their goal, which was emphasized in lyrics and in between songs was to break down stereotypes and prejudices and start listening to each other.

"It all boils down to the same thing. Listen to our hearts and listen to God," Reverend Chandler said.

The concert and pre-party were organized by Yael Avissar and Tom Bales. Both events incorporated groups such as the BMCP and the Black-Jewish Relations Committee, as well as WMUA and the Office of Human Relations, which were instrumental in the smooth success of the evening.

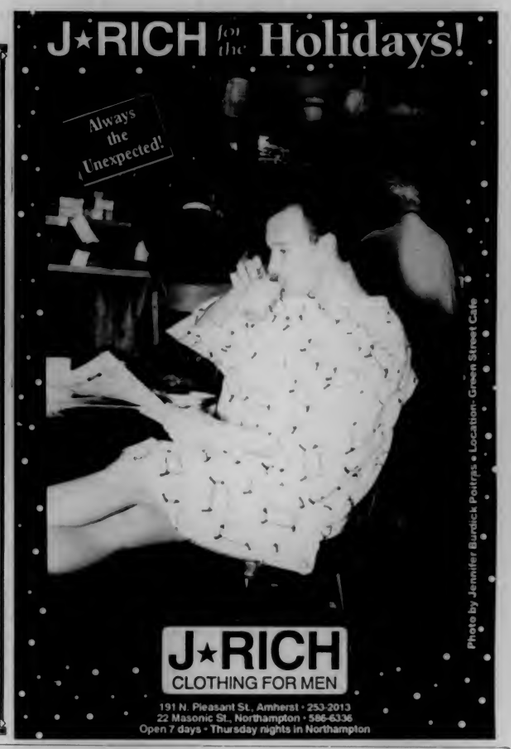
Thank You To All University of Massachusetts Blood Donors

As we end this fall semester and look forward to the Holidays, we would like to thank each one of you for making life better for others by generously supporting our community blood program.



The University of Massachusetts in Amherst will have hosted twenty five drives by the end of the semester. To date, we have collected 1100 plus units of blood and continue to be the largest sponsor of blood drives in the state.

The last two drives of this semester will be held on the 14th & 15th of December in room 101 in The Campus Center from 10am-4pm We know this is a busy time of the year and unfortunately the need for blood is greater. If you can possibly donate, please do!

Our sponsors have been great and have encouraged many to donate to meet the need! THANKS to the following...

Brandeis students strike back against controversial ads

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

WALTHAM — About 250 Brandeis University students Thursday protested against the publication of an advertisement in the campus newspaper questioning whether the Holocaust occurred.

The advertisement in Tuesday's edition of the Justice criticized the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. Several thousand copies of the newspaper were apparently stolen earlier this week at the predominately Jewish university. Fresh copies were distributed under police guard Thursday.

"I thought this was a more liberal and open community that would have little more empathy for why we made our decision," said David Turner, editor-in-chief of the Justice. "We wanted our community to be aware that reprehensible views like these exist in the world and we did not want to put our collective heads in the sand on this issue.

But Antony Polonsky, a professor of Near Eastern and Judaic studies and Holocaust historian, told a rally Thursday: "Holocaust denial is not a serious scholarly debate. This is a new form of hate propaganda. This is not a First Amendment issue."

Drug policies compared

By ABNER KATZMAN
Associated Press

AMSTERDAM, Netherlands — While debate opens up in the United States over legalizing drugs, the trend in Europe is toward increased tolerance for the user - and tougher penalities for the trafficker.

U.S. Surgeon General Joycelyn Elders set off a storm by suggesting America's streets might be safer if drug use were legalized.

In Amsterdam, you don't have to go far to find evidence that appears to support her opinion.

In the red light district, for instance, elderly tourists mingle freely with junkies and let their pocketbooks dangle freely. In a city known as one of Europe's major drug bazaars, purse-snatchings are rare and drug-related crimes of violence are almost unheard of.

"I think the tolerance of both hard and soft drugs has reduced crime in our cities," Amsterdam police spokesman Klaas Wilting said Thursday.

But permissiveness towards drug use may be less significant than other policies - such as strict gun control - in explaining low levels of crime and violence. And Wilting and other European officials oppose of outright legalization.

"If we do that, the government will lose its grip on the (illegal drugs) market, and we can't manage it anymore,"said Justice Ministry spokeswoman Jannie Pols.

Police have focused their war on drugs on traffickers associated with organized

Mandatory use of seat belts to be made into law by Weld

By ROBERT TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — Seat belt proponents turned up the heat Thursday on Gov. William Weld, urging him to sign a mandatory belt bill into law.

The presidents of Massachusetts Medical Society, the Massachusetts Medical Society Alliance, the Massachusetts Bar Association and the Massachusetts College of Emergency Physicians sent a letter to Weld urging him to sign the bill.

"You have a rare opportunity to help save thousand of...citizens from serious injury, lifetime disability or death," the letter stated

"Members of our organizations know all too well the personal and financial costs generated when people do not use seat belts. Massachusetts and its citizens cannot afford those costs for even one more day."

Weld's office said the governor wants to ask voters what they prefer. In 1986, they preferred to buckle up on their own

Weld plans to offer an amendment to the bill calling for a binding referendum vote next November.

Massachusetts had a mandatory seat belt law for eleven months in 1986 before voters repealed it. That year registered the lowest number of accident-related injuries in the state in the past decade.

Advocates said the public's attitude about seat belts had changed since the repeal.

crime, even tolerance toward possession and use makes drugs cheap and easy to get.

The Dutch government eliminated penalties for drug possession in 1976, setting a policy that possession of up to a gram of heroin (.035 ounces) or 30 grams (1.05 ounces) of marijuana or hashish was not a punishable offense.

Even though heroin is readily available, the Dutch addiction rate is one of Europe's lowest, with about 15,000 hard drug addicts and 600,000 marijuana and hashish users in this nation of 15 million.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES(March 21-April 19): A snappy answer could stir up considerable resentment. Keep you impatience in check. Hasty decisions could bring regret.

TAURUS(April 20-May 20): A conflict between career and home can put a crimp in your plans. Diplomacy and an intelligent compromise help alleviate tension.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): A phone call brings welcome news regarding your career or finances. To avoid disappointment, rely solely on you own efforts at work. A co-worker may not be as dependable as you hoped.

CANCER(June 21-July 22): A dream plan begs for attention but so may your list of duties. Get better organized so that you can make the best possible use of you time. Pay bills on time.

LEO(July 23-Aug. 22): Encouraging news comes you way concerning you relatives, legal affairs or academe goals. Be practical. Tonight a loved one could shed light on a domestic matter.

VIRGO(Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Focus on a brighter tomorrow, not lost opportunities, if you want to stay in a cheerful frame of mind. No matter how arduous you responsibilities are, bear them without complaint.

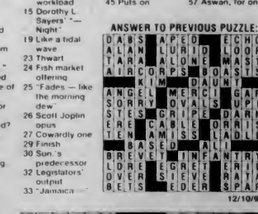
LIBRA(Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Take a long look at your beliefs today. You are lucky to be able to depend on friends of long standing.

SCORPIO(Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You could be a bit stressed or overworked now. Quiet persistence carries you onward to success! Teamwork supplies the extra hands you need, and friends supply the smiles.

SAGITTARIUS(Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Do not try to force you ideas on family members. A conciliatory attitude on you part will net the best results. Tonight, gather your loved ones together and ask their views.

CAPRICORN(Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Talk over your plans with an open mind if at all possible. You could realize a dream years ahead of schedule! New responsibilities will give you a sense of assurance.

AQUARIUS(Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A secret wish inches closer to reality thanks to a friends help. Career aims could get a promising boost through your research or a VIP's private support.



PISCES(Feb. 19-March 20): You cannot expect to make any great career strides without diligent effort. Be careful not to antagonize co-workers in a position to harm or help you.

moment, a glimpse into what could be.

"Special Guest Referee" Greg Iafrate: Thank you Mr. Editor for a few lines in the Collegian spotlight. To watch my favorite NBA player, Michael Jordan, single handedly beat the New York Knicks in the '93 Eastern Conference Championship and call Andrew Bryce as Paxson buries the game-winning trey against the Suns to allow the Bulls to win their third straight NBA title. To all those avid NHL '94 fans, top a record of 157-58-2, with Detroit, before your roommate erases the records.

David Gleeson: The Rocket has to refuel. Roger Clemens, after years of being one of the most consistent and powerful pitchers in baseball, shows he's only human. Sorely missed by Sox fans were the hot summer nights listening to Clemens dominate competition, and record those Ks. The only calm in the storm of the Red Sox, he's sure to come back with force. Next season look for his first no-hitter.

Jorma Kansanen: Ray Bourque receiving a standing ovation from the Boston Garden crowd amidst the tough salary arbitration case with Harry Sinden. The immense fan support for this 12-time First Team All-Star and three-time Norris Trophy winner really put in perspective the special relationship between the city and its hockey team, and myself with one of the best, and classiest, defenseman in NHL history.

Dave Copeland: Sometimes the great sporting events in our lives are our own. When I was a young lad of nine, I played my first horrid season of Little League. In the last game of the season, I was still the team's hitless right fielder. In my last at bat of the season, I stepped up to the plate and popped a blooper to left field. Of course the ump had called time-out a split second before the pitch was thrown, and of course everyone else knew about this, so no one tried to get me out, and of course when the real pitch was thrown I struck out. I'll always know deep down that I finished that season batting .013 instead of .000.

Editor's note: Copeland is a very young undergraduate who just doesn't understand directions.

Catherine Pulley: The $25 I lost during the Phillies/Toronto series. I reached a state of euphoria when Dykstra hit that home run in the bottom of the eighth. I imagined a possible "Kirk Gibson" comeback like my hometown Dodgers in '88 but no such luck ... good luck to those on the bandwagon next year. Phillies are my pick for ... and down with Notre Dame.

Bill Balfour: The end of the 1993 baseball season brought to a close the careers of George Brett and Nolan Ryan. In an age of inflated salaries and fragile egos, these two players were heros cut in the mold of DiMaggio and Williams. Brett and Ryan were classic players who stepped on the diamond everyday for the smell of the grass and the crack of the bat. There aren't many left in baseball who can say that.

Ted Kottler: Much to Reiss' delight, Molitor was the World Series MVP, but Joe Carter provided its greatest moment. It had been 33 years since a Fall Classic had been won with a round tripper, and with his blast, the well-traveled slugger gave baseball a badly needed kick in the pants. And considerably worse to Mitch Williams.

Anthony Guido: Randy Jacobs' 38th career goal on Oct. 23 against Philadelphia Textile. Jacobs, a senior forward, set the all-time UMass record for goals and points. It added drama to a disappointing season, as all the Minutemen swamped Jacobs at the center of the field. It was a great feeling to interview Jacobs' father after the game and see the most proud a parent could possibly be. Randy deflected all the praise to his teammates and was more concerned with his team's tough season.

My second favorite highlight is a national champion (FSU) will be crowned in college football and no one will care about Notre Dame, right Hayden?

Andrew Bryce: When I recall sports memories, I think of upsets. Of Robin Ventura getting upset enough to charge the mound only to be tanked by ageless wonder Nolan Ryan, of Michael Jordan upsetting the NBA by surprisingly retiring, of UMass hoops upsetting No. 1 UNC, of BC upsetting No. 1 Notre Dame, of yours truly upsetting No. 3 Gleeson in Sega NHL '94 and winning for the first time in 30 games, of my man Holyfield upsetting Bowe for the Heavyweight Championship, of my other man Hayden getting upset at me for running the wrong pass pattern during our annual "UMass Out of Shape Bowl" last weekend — upsets galore. One upset that should have occured.

Knicks beating the Bulls in '93. Save that for '94.

Dan Wetzel: Edging the UMass women's soccer's trip to the Final Four (Anson don't know Sal-ad) comes an event from an unlikely place: Schaefer/ Sullivan/ Foxboro Stadium.

Sixty-thousand of us Patriot followers giving a standing ovation at the New England/Seattle game for a plane circling above, pulling a banner which read: "We wanted wins not blue uniforms and a crap logo." My sentiments exactly. Get Marshall Faulk and J.J. Stokes in here and bring back Pat the Patriot.

David Scott: Wetzel stole mine, the rat. So, I'll have to go with the pressbox clam chowder at the second to last football game. Vic could cook with The Shirl anyday of the week.

Matt Vautour: UMass defeats defending National Champion Old Dominion in field hockey: This win was the field hockey equivalent of the UMass' victory over UNC in basketball. The 2-0 victory over the No. 2 Lady Monarchs gave Coach Hixon's previously underrated team national respect.

It ended the jinx of seven straight losses to ODU and catupulted the Minutewomen to their second straight A-10 title and a Final Eight appearance in the NCAA championships.

Honorable mention: Oct. 30, 1993. Hockey makes its triumphant return to the University of Massachusetts. The future is bright.

Jeff Crofts: Let's relax for a minute here. Settle down, guys. My memory? A bad, comical one. It was when my housemate Jan (pronounced Yawn) beat me in Sega hockey for the very first time. It was his first win ever. I mean he is terrible. We always have the same matchup. I'm always the Sharks. He's always the Wales All-Stars. I always used to win until that fateful day, now I just win three out of four. Aah, yeah. Aah, yeah. Aah, yeah.

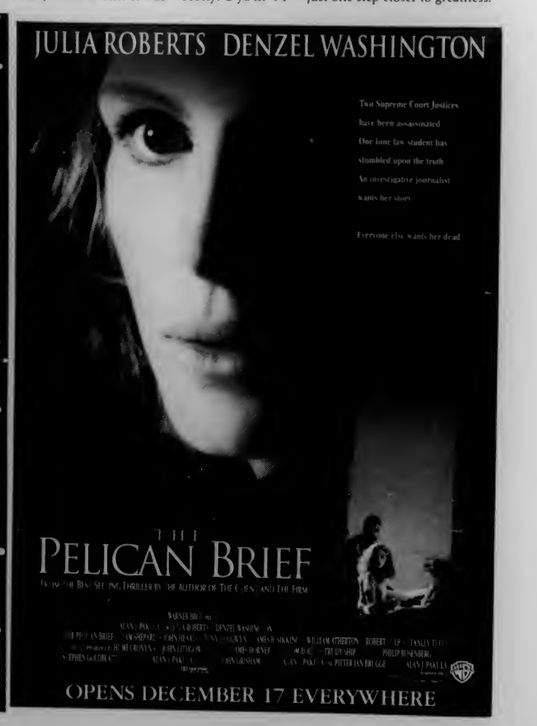
Sean P. Hayden: Notre Dame 31, Florida State 24. I'm not going to let all the naysayers and petty, hack Notre Dame haters stop me from mentioning the biggest victory in the biggest game of the season in my favorite sport. The Irish beat the unbeatable and nobody thought they could do it.

Everybody knew that if they used this before I had the chance, I'd rip off their necks and [expletive] down their throats. Thank you, guys. All I want to say is: I told you so, I told you so, I told you so. Way back in September, I told you so.

If not for four Jeff Burris dropped interceptions and a tipped pass somehow finding its way to Kez McCorvey, ND would've won this one by at least 21. I can't remember much about rushing the field afterward, except that my feet never touched the ground and I still have the stadium sod in the brim of my hat. I was high ... on adrenaline. Beat that, Guido.

"Sports Editor Emeritus" Michael Morrissey: The Atlanta Braves were 10 games down right after the All-Star break in July before they made one of the maddest rushes ever at the front-running San Francisco Giants to capture the National League West title on the season's 162nd day.

Seeing the Braves sweep the Colorado Rockies in the last week and get 103 wins, then watching the Giants and Solomon Torres get bombed by the Dodgers on the last day was awesome. It was, in my mind, the greatest comeback in a pennant race, and (with the fragmentation of divisions), one of the last.



Arthur Stapleton Jr.: First off, the trip to South Bend brought many memories. Getting into the Notre Dame locker room the night before the game was interesting. Touching the real "Play Like Champions Today" sign. Mike Morrissey's attempt at taking an Irish helmet was humorous.

But, of course, the biggest sporting event . . . hell, the best thing to ever happen to this University, besides the Collegian Basketball Preview and yesterday's Best and Worst of 1993 pullout, was the victory by Calipari and company over No. 1 North Carolina.

Broadcasting (uh, if yelling and screaming is called that nowadays) the contest with the best play-by-play man in the game today and so-so roommate, Sean P., was something special for all in our listening audience and in attendence at MSG.

As Sports Editor, on behalf of my devoted associates (Hayden and Vautour) and staff, I'd like to bid you a fond farewell. Thanks to Bill Strickland, Lamar Chance, Michelle Drum and UMass Media Relations. Our condolences, Lammy, for being snubbed of a Scotty. C-ya in '94 — just one step closer to greatness.

■ bench

were junior center Jeff Meyer (six points, four rebounds) and sophomore forward Ted Cottrell (eight points, three rebounds). Both played more than 10 minutes, but neither performed to the level defensively that Calipari was hoping for.

With usually three explosive scorers available in the starting lineup in Lou Roe (27 points, seven rebounds), Donta Bright and Mike Williams, Calipari said scoring is not the most important ingredient off his bench.

"Defense and rebounding are what we need most off the bench," Calipari said. "We usually have guys (starters) that can score on the floor, so we need defense and rebounding."

Somebody help me!

Calipari's 'new' season starts with a blowout

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

No. 8 Massachusetts began what Coach John Calipari termed a "new season" last night by pounding lowly Central Connecticut State, 90-63, in the William D. Mullins Center.

Central Conn. State	63
Massachusetts	90

The Minutemen (6-1) jumped out to a 27-10 lead over CCSU before the first television time-out with less than 10 minutes gone by in the contest, and the Blue Devils could never recover. CCSU pulled within 14 on its first possession after the timeout on a Pavel Petrov three-pointer, but it was the closest the Blue Devils would get.

"Now, we're 1-0 coming into the 'new' season and we just can't look back. Hopefully, we'll just keep improving on what we've accomplished [already]," said junior co-captain Derek Kellogg.

Junior co-captain Lou Roe led Massachusetts with 27 points. Sophomore Dana Dingle recorded eight points and eight boards for the Minutemen. Petrov, a junior from Moscow, Russia, along with dimunitive 5-foot-9 point guard Michael Donnelly, each tallied 15 for CCSU.

Massachusetts travels to Worcester tomorrow night (8 p.m.) to face Holy Cross at the Centrum.

Mike Williams, the usual starting guard for the Minutemen, did not play against the Blue Devils. Williams, a 6-3 junior, missed a 7 a.m. practice earlier this week and was benched by Calipari. Williams said he skipped the practice because he had to focus on academics.

"I had to get my academics straight. This week I had a lot of work to do . I had to take off practice, so Coach [Calipari] told me if I took off, I couldn't play," said Williams.

"Mike got behind a little bit academically and stayed up late when we had an early morning practice," said Calipari. "If you wanna dance, you've got to pay the band. Sometimes what happens in athletics, you get kids here in school who want to dance but want someone else to pay the band.

"You can't do that. If you screw up in school and you don't do your work, you get absolutely nothing out of it. Could Mike have played today? Yes, but he missed practice."

Freshman guard Edgar Padilla replaced Williams in the starting line-up and came out shooting, draining a three-pointer on Massachusetts' fourth possession. Padilla ended up with a career-high 10 points while dishing out four assists. He said working with the first team in practice helped out a lot.

"I felt more comfortable because I knew I was going to start right away. Thank God, it was my first start and I did well. I was ready for it and I just have to keep playing hard," said Padilla.

Another freshman, Carmelo Travieso, stood out as well, tallying a career-high in both points (12) and minutes played (21). Padilla said that he and Travieso, as a tandem, will be counted on later in the year to spell Williams and Kellogg, so games like the victory over CCSU are key.

"We have to learn how to play together because we are the future of this team in the backcourt and as long as we do that, we're going to be alright," said Padilla.

The Massachusetts bench made the most of its opportunity to get into the scoring column, producing 35 points in 68 minutes. Sophomore forward Rigoberto Nunez was again the first Minuteman off the pine and scored a career-high six points in 19 minutes of action.

Massachusetts led 46-20 at halftime, holding the Blue Devils to 23 percent shooting from the field.

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

Massachusetts junior forward Lou Roe scored 27 points and grabbed seven rebounds to lead the Minutemen in a 90-63 drubbing of Central Connecticut State last night at the Mullins Center.

CCSU would hold its own in the second half, mainly because the Minutemen couldn't keep the intensity up, according to Calipari.

The Minutemen shot extremely well from the free throw line against the Blue Devils, going 14-18 (78 percent).

UMass bench earns mixed reviews in rout

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

With starting shooting guard Mike Williams sitting out after skipping practice two days ago to concentrate on academics, and Central Connecticut State not exactly being a basketball powerhouse, University of Massachusetts Coach John Calipari was able to empty his bench in the Minutemen's 90-63 rout over the Blue Devils last night.

According to Calipari, his bench played to mixed reviews; even though the reserves scored 35 points, they also played a major part in the lackadaisical second half in which the Minutemen only outscored the Blue Devils by 1, 44-43.

Sophomore forward Rigoberto Nunez, a walk-on last season, was the first Minuteman off the bench and did a number of good things, according to Calipari. Nunez scored six points, including one big-time jam on the fast break, and grabbed five rebounds in the contest.

Calipari said that Nunez, who has seen increased playing time as of late, was the one reserve who truly showed he belonged on the court for an extended period.

"He deserves to be here, I mean how about him running down the floor and dunking on the other team? He deserves it (the playing time)," Calipari said.

Rigo said that ever since he made the club he has always thought of being a contributor on the court for the Minutemen.

"My first goal was to make the team, then it was to get some (playing) time," Nunez said. "Now it is to be a real member of the team and make a significant contribution."

While Nunez might have stepped in and played well in his time off the bench, Calipari said he thinks some of the other UMass reserves did not play up to their capabilities, especially during that sluggish second half in which the Minutemen allowed Central Connecticut State to shoot 49 percent from the floor as opposed to the 23 percent in the first half.

With Williams sitting out the game, UMass' pair of freshman guards, Edgar Padilla (who got the start) and Carmelo Travieso, saw a combined 40 minutes of action. Calipari had definite opinions on both.

"Edgar's a good ballplayer. He tries to steal the ball too much and Edgar tries to make some great plays but that's because he hasn't been coached by us long enough."

"Carmelo is going to be a good player for us, but right now his intensity level has got to come up, it has got to," Calipari said.

Swimmers fare well at A-10's, place fourth

By BILL BALFOUR
Collegian Staff

Despite the absence of some of its top swimmers, the University of Massachusetts men's swimming team finished fourth at the Atlantic 10 Championships and broke a few school records in the process last weekend.

West Virginia won the meet with a total of 695.5 points followed by George Washington and St. Bonaventure. UMass placed fourth with 480 points.

"We would've liked to have done better," Coach Russ Yarworth said. "But we moved in the right direction."

Yarworth was very pleased with the effort he saw from his team.

"I'm very pleased," he said. "The kids swam their hearts out."

Junior Tim Milbert stole the show for UMass, breaking both the Atlantic 10 and Massachusetts varsity records in the 200 yard backstroke. Milbert finished first in a time of 2:04.54.

"He gave a very good performance," Yarworth said. "He's a talented swimmer, the sky's the limit."

Milbert's record performance wasn't the only one for the Minutemen.

The 200-yard freestyle relay team of Sean Clark, Jose Santa, Adam Reich and Greg Menton broke the UMass record with a time 1:24.05.

"I think they can go even faster," Yarworth said.

Menton also broke the school freshman record in the 50-yard freestyle. Menton finished the race in :21.03, breaking the old record of :21.54, set six years ago.

UMass had several other strong performances over the weekend. The Minutemen placed in the top 10 in several other events.

The 400-yard medley relay team placed fifth in 3:27.39 and the 800-yard freestyle relay team came in fourth with a time of 6:52.02.

In the 200-yard freestyle, Jose Santa and James Stevens placed fourth and sixth respectively. Tim Milbert and Jeff Shearstone finished second and eighth in the 100-yard breaststroke.

The Minutemen are off to a fast start and Yarworth has no complaints.

"I can't complain," he said. "We're 4-0."

The next meet will be held in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., on December 31, where the Minutemen will participate in the Ed Kennedy Invitational.

Misty eyed memories of the semester that was

By midnight Dec. 31, 19 Naughty III will be but a memory. The Collegian Sports Staff would like to share its memories of the past semester with you. Take it away:

Candice Flemming: "Take a good look because one minute I'll be there and the next minute I'll be gone." Unfortunately for his fans, Michael Jordan wasn't joking when he said this in his new book Rare Air. No longer will we see the man who made it fashionable to stick out your tongue soar above the rim and dunk over a helpess opponent. He wanted to go out on top, which he did because he left as the greatest player of all time. He had nothing left to prove; he knew he was the best.

Michael Reiss: Paul Molitor winning a World Series ring: This boyhood idol of mine, who overcame a cocaine addiction early in his career, signed on with the Toronto Blue Jays at the start of the year. From obscurity in Milwaukee to the spotlight in Toronto, this 37-year old finally got his due. To a man who plays the game with heart, desire and hustle, he was 12-for-24 in the Series, garnering Most Valuable Player honors. As he held the MVP trophy over his head, tears and champagne rolled down his face. He had overcome the odds.

Justin Doyle: Boston College 41, Notre Dame 39. This was an easy choice. I have never talked so much trash about a game in my life. After ND destroyed the Eagles last year, revenge was definitely a factor. When I looked on the schedule, I went right past the ND versus Florida State game. I knew the Irish would be coming off a big win, and I felt the Eagles could win in South Bend.

Sean, Art and Michael should have waited a week and saw the real game of the year. I told you so, Sean. Glenn Foley had the game of his career and David Gordon had the moment of a lifetime. I'll never forget watching the game. "Who's ESPN laughing at now, who's ESPN laughing at now," said an Eagle lineman following the upset. Certainly not BC.

Mike DiLorenzo: When Evander Holyfield topped Riddick Bowe to regain the World Heavyweight Crown, it impressed a number of things upon me. The lionhearted Holyfield proved that brains beats brawn and that it is better to win

But what is most memorable for me was the courage both fighters had that night; in a sport that seems so crooked and tarnished and many fans are disillusioned by its claims, these two gave boxing a shining

Bike thieves caught

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

University police recovered nearly $10,000 worth of stolen bicycles and parts in December. Three students were charged with larceny in two separate incidents.

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

If your bike or a part of your bike has been stolen on campus, it might have recently been found in two separate incidences where University of Massachusetts students were caught with possession of stolen bikes.

On Dec. 9, Adrian Erdman of Bedford and Brian L. Galloway of Lexington were stopped by two UMass police officers for driving a car with an expired registration sticker of a Ford Fairlane.

Police said when they pulled the vehicle over, two officers, Robert Waskiewicz and Stephen Westerling, saw three bicycle frames in the back seat.

After the two men were pulled over, the police obtained a search warrant to look in their rooms in the Butterfield dormitory.

Police said they found what they estimated to be over $8,000 worth of bicycle parts, as well as several bicycles, stolen tools, a hacksaw, cable and bolt cutters.

Bike parts such as wheels, tires, chains, frames, tubes and mountain bike parts were also found.

"We believe that many of the bikes found were stolen from campus," said John Luippold, UMass public safety director and police chief.

Police also said they found two stolen tanks of nitrous oxide which was reported missing from an academic building in October.

The tank equipment recovered from the room was estimated to be worth over $1,000.

Police said both men were charged with five counts of larceny of property and possession of burglary tools. They were also being charged fines for possession of alcohol while being underage.

On Dec. 17, just two weeks after the first incident, another UMass student was charged for possession of stolen bikes.

A UMass police officer, Pablo Rodriguez, received information that several bikes, presumably stolen, were located in the room of Kamali J. Thornell.

Scott focuses on the future

Planning ahead essential to University's success

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

With new ideas and the hiring of two new administrators, Chancellor David K. Scott has stirred up the campus in his first semester at the University of Massachusetts and is now ready to continue with more changes for the spring semester.

> "What we have to do is look at the next five years and try to look at what changes are taking place in education."
> – Chancellor David K. Scott

Named chancellor by the Board of Trustees in 1992, Scott graduated with a Ph.D. in nuclear physics from Oxford University.

He first became involved in academic administration when he became associate provost at Michigan State University. In 1986, Scott became provost and vice-president of academic affairs.

When he came to UMass, Scott brought with him ideas of making a model land-grant university for the future.

"One of the things that interested me about this place is that this is a land-grant university and also a major research university," he said. "And from my own background, I feel that land-grant universities are going to be very important for the future of higher education in the United States."

Scott said the University's activity in making changes was a main reason why he chose to come here.

Last semester, Scott began work on a major strategic planning process for the University.

"What we have to do is look at the next five years and try to look at what changes are taking place in education," Scott said.

"We also have to look at what kind of resources are going to be available for higher education and put together a plan that can continue this University on a strong path," he said.

Scott said the University has been going through a very difficult period in the last five years because it has lost a large amount of state funding.

"This lack of funding has affected the quality of programs and the quality of support. A crucial part of our future has to be a strategic plan that will strengthen programs no matter our financial situation," he said.

This elaborate planning process was put into place last semester and will continue to operate in the next year and a half.

"Everything in the University has to become more connected and integrated. And this is what we are going to work on," he said.

Scott also spent last semester becoming familiar with the other colleges in the area and the dynamics of the UMass campus.

"It was a case of getting oriented. I saw a lot of people, talked to a lot of people, called inside the University and the surrounding communities," Scott said.

Last semester, Scott created two new administrative posts for which he hired a couple he worked with at Michigan State. Critics of the decision questioned where the money to pay their salaries would come from, and whether the hirings would lead to a decrease in faculty. Marcellette Williams will be paid $110,000 a year, and Keith Williams will earn $75,000.

Chancellor David K. Scott

Scott said Marcellette Williams will be involved in strategic planning, and in the linking the chancellors' offices of the five UMass campuses. Keith Williams will work in the area of University development and advancement.

"I wanted to build up an additional strength in the area of the University relations and advancement," Scott said. "That is an area that is going to be expanded and be increasingly important for the future of the University. I hired Keith Williams to help with these goals."

Officials discuss possible fee hike

By MICHAEL REISS
Collegian Staff

On Dec. 14, Vice chancellor for administration and finance Paul J. Page stated to the Faculty Senate there are potential budgetary problems for the 1994-95 school year.

Page said the University is going to need more money in order to meet the set budget.

According to Page, there are many different places and positions on campus where additional money could be drawn. He said if money was taken from the student fee, the percentage of increase needed to fill the gap would be approximately 4 percent.

A 4 percent increase would result in an extra $80 in fees for in-state students. Out-of-state student tuition fees would go up by $440.

"At the Faculty Senate meeting, I gave a report that indicated without any increase in budgetary matters, we'd have problems with the budget again," Page said.

Page said the idea of an increase in tuition fee is currently being discussed.

"There was no proposal. It was put into the context that if it were to go up with the student fee, it would have to go up by that amount," Page said.

"It's a long way before we know what will happen. We're trying to avoid [increasing the tuition fee] because we're concerned about the total cost to students. No decisions have been made. It's too early," he said.

Undergraduate Student Speaker Matt Pavesi stands firmly against a possible increase, and is urging students to speak out.

UMass currently has the second highest in-state tuition rate at approximately $5,000 per semester. Vermont has the highest in-state tuition rate at a public university.

"We feel enough is enough. The goal of the University is to make it accessible to all, the upper and lower class," Pavesi said.

He said over the past four years, increases have accumulated 166 percent.

"What we're arguing for is that tuition fee should not be raised by one penny," Pavesi said.

Parents file lawsuit against UM professor

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

The parents of a Mount Holyoke College student who died while on exchange in Italy have filed a lawsuit charging a University of Massachusetts professor with negligence in the death of their daughter.

Judith Ann Kehde and Karl H. Kehde of Branchville, N.J. filed the suit on Jan. 13 in Hampshire County Superior Court. They said their daughter, Vanessa Kehde, died three years ago from exposure to carbon monoxide leaking from a shower in her apartment in Siena. They are seeking an unspecified amount in damages.

In the spring of 1991, Vanessa Kehde, who was a junior at Mount Holyoke College at the time, took part in an exchange program in Italy. According to the Kehde's lawsuit, Anthony Ferrizzi, a UMass professor of French and Italian, arranged for Vanessa Kehde's apartment, which had a shower that leaked carbon monoxide.

It also claims that Ferrizzi and the University, which is also listed under the lawsuit as a defendant, knew the shower was emitting poisonous gas and did not warn Vanessa Kehde before she moved in.

Vanessa Kehde was hospitalized after passing out while showering on Jan. 12, according to the suit. She was released and took another shower two days later, after which she became ill and died. The lawsuit does not say how the gas got into the shower.

Ferrizzi, who was contacted at his home last Friday, declined to comment on the lawsuit.

Judith Anne Kehde, also reached last Friday, said the accident has destroyed her family. She said the family has no plans to drop the lawsuit and have also filed in federal court.

"No money in the world can ever pay back for the suffering," Kehde said.

She said they have also filed suits against both the landlord and the doctors in Italy.

Kendra H. Kehde and Brendan K. Kehde, sister and brother of Vanessa Kehde are also listed as plaintiffs in the lawsuit.

Karin Sherbin, UMass spokesperson said the University declines comment on pending lawsuits. The state is also listed in the suit as a defendant.

BCA boycott stalled by Justice Dept.

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

While the past few weeks may have been restful ones for the students and faculty of the University of Massachusetts, it has been a rather hectic and uneasy time for both the higher-ups at the National Collegiate Athletics Association and the members of the Black Coaches Association, due to the threats from the BCA that they will boycott NCAA sanctioned basketball games if its requests are not met.

> "It's not a basketball issue at all, it's an issue of opportunity. That is what everybody is forgetting about."
> – UMass Assistant Coach James "Bruiser" Flint

Members of the BCA, led by Rudy Washington, head basketball coach at Drake University, have been very vocal in recent times for what they feel is a lack of respect and action on the part of the NCAA, the governing body of collegiate athletics.

The focal point of the argument between the NCAA and the BCA is the number of basketball scholarships the NCAA limits its member schools to. The number of scholarships used to stand at 15, but the NCAA, in an attempt to ease the financial burden for each school under its jurisdiction, took away two scholarships three years ago.

The BCA gave the NCAA a Jan. 15 deadline to meet its demands of adding at least one more scholarship or they will start boycotting games.

The boycott never took place because President Clinton ordered the Justice Department to investigate the matter and mediate negotiations between the two groups on Friday, Jan. 14, one day before the planned boycott.

The BCA has the support of coaches all across the nation, including Massachusetts Coach John Calipari.

"I agree completely with what they're trying to do," Calipari said, while not stating if he would take part in the boycott.

The BCA's argument is that there are 330 Division I basketball programs and roughly two-thirds of the players are black. Another scholarship would give an estimated 200 additional black youths, many of whom would not otherwise have the chance to go to college were it not for a scholarship, an opportunity at higher education.

"Everybody's been talking about the scholarship, not just the black coaches," said Massachusetts Assistant Coach James "Bruiser" Flint, "But they're the ones who stepped to the forefront on the issue."

"It's not a basketball issue at all, it's an issue of opportunity," said Flint. "That's what everybody is forgetting about."

The BCA has planned other actions similar to the boycott if the scholarship is not reinstated. The actions include a 20 minute delay of all televised games, sit-ins at halftime of games and a refusal to take part in the jump ball at the Final Four championship this spring in Charlotte, N.C.

Ph.D. student files discrimination suit

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

A suit was filed against the University of Massachusetts for denying an extension for a handicapped man from Amherst to obtain his doctoral degree here at the University, in December.

Steven A. Croffoot, a Sioux Indian, stated his request for an extension to finish his doctoral degree in sociology in the Hampshire Superior Court civil suit.

Croffoot first filed a complaint with the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination when he was not rehired in the Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration Department as a lecturer.

The suit is aimed at the UMass Board of Trustees and Gene Fisher, an associate professor of sociology at the University.

Croffoot said Fisher had made defamatory remarks about his ability to complete the doctoral program.

Fisher refused to make any comments on the case.

The suit also states the fact that Croffoot has been a UMass doctoral degree applicant since 1981. His handicap has helped him obtain extensions to finish the program in the past.

Yet in January of 1992, Croffoot was denied another extension after he finished his comprehensive exam and course work.

According to UMass spokeswoman Karin Sherbin, it takes an average time of 6.5 years for a person to earn a doctorate in sociology.

Croffoot's handicaps include temporal lobe epilepsy, vascular headaches and chronic pain.

Croffoot has filed three different lawsuits against UMass in the past. In 1989, a suit was filed for a million dollars in the U.S. District Court, Springfield against the University.

At that time he alleged that the school was discriminating against the physically handicapped as well as having racial bias.

He also filed a similar lawsuit, at that same time, in Hampshire Superior Court.

The current suit states that those two cases were settled just before the extension for his requested doctoral degree was denied.

Fisher declined to comment on whether the case has been settled or not.

Campus Center garage x-rayed after collision

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

Before students left for break, on December 1, 1993, a box-shaped vendor truck attempting to enter the Campus Center garage went into the wrong entrance on the first floor.

Because the truck continued to drive the wrong way, damage was caused in the garage.

Richard Nathhorst, from the physical plant on campus, said the top of the truck ran into the top part of the garage ceiling.

"The truck collided with a structural part of the garage, otherwise known as the brace. It is a member of the many things which hold the garage up," Nathhorst said.

The truck was too high and the crash ruined a beam which is part of the structure of the garage.

"Evidently, a rental truck got lost in the garage and made a right hand turn where no trucks are supposed to go. This collision caused damage to the concrete beam system," Nathhorst said.

Tests were done on January 11 and the 16 to determine how much damage was done.

The physical plant on campus and the University building authority hired a radiographic testing firm and an engineering firm outside the University to test the results of the damage.

The testing consisted of x-rays being taken of the structure of the garage in order to actually see the damage.

"We wanted to have radiographic testing in order to see the extent of the damage. The x-rays were being taken to deform the extent of the damage," Nathhorst said.

At this point the results from the tests have not been issued.

"Although what was damaged is only a small part of the building's structure, we want to make sure everything is still intact," Nathhorst said.

Recurrent car trouble plagues Chevy owner

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

A UMass student thought he had his car stolen on Jan. 7, but that did not turn out to be what actually occurred on that fateful night.

Ian Quinn was unable to find his car as he prepared to leave downtown Amherst at 1 a.m. He called the police to report that his 1986 blue Chevrolet Nova had been stolen.

An officer responded to the call and observed a blue Nova parked on the same street. After checking the registration, he called the owner, Tanya Hannon of Amherst.

Hannon, who had been drinking, had apparently entered Quinn's car through the unlocked door and used her key to start the ignition, according to Detective Ron Young. She then drove home with her boyfriend, Paul Edelman.

According to Melissa Garman, a Detroit-based Chevrolet spokeswoman, Hannon's key or Quinn's ignition could have worn over the years, letting her start the car. She also said a single key sometimes works in more than one car because only so many keys are cut.

Hannon and Edelman, both UMass students, returned the car to Quinn at 4 a.m. in Amherst center. They got into Edelman's Honda Civic with him at the wheel and headed away while Quinn retrieved his "borrowed" car.

The night of car troubles didn't end there for Quinn. As he drove through the downtown area in his Nova, he ran into a Honda Civic making an illegal U-turn, according to police.

The occupants of the Civic were all too familiar. Quinn was again faced with Hannon and Edelman.

Edelman was cited by the police for making an improper turn. Quinn's car, however, was totaled.

Wire reports contributed to this story.

■ fee hike

The Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy recently polled 400 random students asking them to rank what they feel the top issues on campus are.

According to Pavesi, rising tuition fees ranked second behind the quality of professors.

"We're paying enough already. Even a one percent increase won't be tolerated," he said.

Pavesi said there is money put to waste around campus.

"Put that money in the financial aid pool, and a lot of students could have come here. Where are students to turn?" he said.

UMass is ranked 49th in state legislative support. Pavesi said he feels UMass is looked down upon because of other institutions such as Harvard and Boston College, which receive more attention, Pavesi said.

"We're forgotten about. That has to end," he said.

Quake strikes California

Aftershocks still affecting many parts of the state

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Staff

At 4:31 a.m. on January 19, a devastating earthquake hit southern California, leaving freeways in rubble and destroying homes and apartment complexes. The quake took over 55 lives, left 10,000 people in shelters and another 14,000 in parks and on lawns who are too frighened to be indoors.

The quake measured 6.6 on the Richter scale and was centered in the San Fernando Valley, 20 miles northwest of downtown Los Angeles. Some major freeways have been closed, turning commuting into a nightmare.

The National Guard mobilized 2,000 soldiers and has proposed to erect six tent cities for homeless families. One thousand people are without power and 20,000 are without water as of press time. Twenty-five thousand homes were damaged or beyond repair.

Ninety-five schools in Los Angles County will be closed for an unknown time and California State University at Northridge, the site of the epicenter, suffered $125 million worth of damage.

Michelle Mazzuchi, a senior at UMass, is on exchange to Cal State, Northridge.

"It was like nothing that I had experienced before. It was so loud... like a plane crash," said Mazzuchi, a native of Canton, Mass. "It seems like it lasts forever." She said classes will not be held and the dorms will not be reopened until February 14.

After the quake her dormitory was evacuated and, according to Mazzuchi, no checks for accountability have been made. She said even though she was frightened, she planned to live in California after she graduated.

Cal Tech reported aftershocks within 20 minutes after the initial quake, with the largest so far being at 5.5 on the Richter scale. Hundreds of aftershocks have been reported, damaging structures more and not allowing people to return to their homes.

Carrie Edginton, a freshman at UMass, lives in Granada Hills, a city within close proximity to the epicenter.

"I thought it was the big one. It was so rough," Edginton said. "It was one of the scariest things I have ever experienced. It is so powerful and you cannot control it."

Edginton's home has cracks in the walls, is without water, and was without mail for almost a week. A stone wall that separated her house with her neighbor's fell over. She said she is looking forward to coming back to Amherst.

Jennifer Pelz, a graduate student at UMass, and a resident of Northridge experienced smashed windows in every room of her home, broken door frames, and a loss of power.

"My house was the worst hit on the block," said Pelz. Unlike many residents in Northridge, she has both water and power. Pelz said she was looking forward to leaving Southern California.

Ice slows down move-in day

ARAM COMJEAN/COLLEGIAN

Joseph Chalifoux and his dad move a refrigerator in the Southwest Residential Area.

By DARIENNE J. HOSLEY
Collegian Staff

Slippery roads and slushy walkways forced students and their families to proceed cautiously Sunday as thousands of University students returned to their home away from home.

"I'm pleasantly surprised we didn't have any accidents," said Chika Nnamani, executive director of Housing Services. "We're glad it wasn't September — we'd have more traffic and luggage."

More than 10,000 students moved into the dormitories, and poor road conditions made the always hectic process even more difficult. "It sucks," said one cold and tired traffic staffer after pushing yet another car out of the snow.

Twelve University police officers, eight security officers and nearly 40 student security staff worked throughout the day to keep problems to a minimum.

"It's been pretty rough since noon," said Tim O'Brien, a member of the traffic staff on Orchard Hill. "The roads are still pretty icy — it's just a matter of getting everyone in and out safely."

No accidents were reported to University police, but Amherst police responded to 10 calls on Sunday.

Snow and sleet from a Jan. 17 storm, followed by more than a week of frigid temperatures, have frustrated both town and University ground crews.

"We've never had ice on the roads for this long," said Noel Ryan, superintendent of the Amherst Department of Public Works. "Our salt won't work below the 20s, and it's been below that for over 10 days."

Cleaning roads to the bottom surface during freezing rain creates an ice slick, so work crews left some slush on the roads after the Martin Luther King Day storm. Persistently cold weather turned the slush to ice, and left towns across the state with a major ice problem.

"[The ice] is on there like concrete. There's nothing we have that will take it off," Ryan said.

According the New England Regional Climate Center, the slight warming that began Tuesday should continue throughout the week, and the salt and snowplows should be able to do their job.

Nearly 27 inches of snow have fallen this month alone, as measured at Bradley International Airport in Hartford, Conn. The average January snowfall is just 12.1 inches, and the seasonal average is 46.1 inches. Another storm is forecast for Thursday night into Friday.

Frigid temperatures burst a steam pipe on the second floor of John Adams Residence Hall over a week ago, and Physical Plant workers made last-minute repairs to stabilize heating in the towers before students returned Sunday.

A bigger, better Collegian

The issue:
The first Collegian of the Spring 1994 semester is a larger, full-size newspaper.

Our opinion:
The larger size demonstrates the Collegian's commitment to producing a high-quality newspaper.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian was founded in 1890 as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914, and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1956. The Collegian has been printed daily since 1967.

Today marks another milestone in the history of the Collegian as the paper prints in a larger, broadsheet format, a change from the smaller, tabloid size our readers are used to.

The University of Massachusetts is becoming a world-class university, and as it changes, so must the campus' daily newspaper.

The Collegian is the only source many people in the UMass community turn to for local, national and world news. That is a privilege and a responsibility which we take very seriously.

As part of our ongoing commitment to produce the highest-quality paper possible, you will notice several changes in the days ahead:

- A larger front page will allow more in-depth coverage of local and campus news as well as a better variety of national and world news.
- The Sports page is growing along with our school's athletic program, and continues to bring you the best coverage of UMass sports you'll find anywhere.
- The Arts & Living section's weekly guide to entertainment in the Pioneer Valley will take on a whole new look.
- An expanded Editorial page will make it easier for you, the reader, to make your voice heard.
- Plus, we've brought the Far Side back to the comics page and added Doonesbury as well.

Our readers' questions and comments about some of the changes we've made are welcome and invited. The Collegian is, after all, your daily newspaper.

Address your letters to the Collegian, 113 Campus Center, Amherst, Mass. 01003. Better yet, stop by our offices and drop off your comments in person. We are located in the Campus Center Basement, on the end opposite the ATMs.

Test provides peace of mind

I recently got tested for HIV. That shocks most people who know me. They say things like, "but, you couldn't have that." Well, yes I could, and so could all my friends. It only takes one person and, contrary to what most people believe, HIV is not a disease that only affects homosexuals or those who indulge in "risky behavior." It really can affect anyone.

It all started in August. I was dating someone at the time, and we discussed relationships in the '90s. We agreed that HIV testing was a good idea for two people who wanted to start a healthy, strong relationship. We both had plans to call and make an appointment.

Tracy Monahan

I made my appointment at Health Services because it's free and anonymous. That's important. 'Anonymous' means you get a number and no one can ever know the results unless you decide to tell them. 'Confidential' means the test is usually done at your doctor's office and you and your doctor know the results. 'Confidential' test results go on your medical records and, if they are disclosed, you can face discrimination from insurance firms, medical clinics and basically the rest of society that fears HIV and those who carry it.

I don't know if the man I was dating ever made the appointment. We broke up before I found out. After that, I debated whether or not I should go through with it. After all, I was going to be tested in order to start this relationship off with a clean slate, and now the relationship was over. I debated it all the way up to the very day of the test. I finally decided that I would be tested for myself. I was 99 percent sure that I didn't have it, but what if?

It was the Tuesday before Thanksgiving break. I planned to go to Health Services, with my code name "Lynne." I admit it, I was terrified. A good friend offered to go with me and I took him up on the offer. I sat in the waiting room, staring at the pictures on the wall and feeling abject terror.

I kept thinking of my parents and how I could ever explain to them that I had it, if I did. I thought about my life and all the good things and what would happen to me. At that moment I felt mortal. I knew I could die and will die someday. I could only pray that it wouldn't be soon. My friend sat quietly, read a magazine and held my hand. He never asked how I was feeling, but I was glad because I didn't want to talk to anyone at that point.

I spoke to the counselor, got my blood taken and then prepared myself to wait. At Health Services, they send the blood to a state laboratory so you have to wait two weeks to get the results. Surprisingly, it wasn't an agonizing two weeks. I managed to put it out of my head.

Two weeks later, I had another appointment, this time to pick up my results. For two hours before my appointment I paced, cried and couldn't sit still. I was scared to death to go pick up the results. I debated not going and both my sister and my housemate told me I was ridiculous. They were right, of course; I did it and I might as well find out.

I went to Health Services, this time by myself. I didn't want anyone with me. I was called in to see the same counselor, but I'd forgotten the paper with my bar code number. This was important. Because the test was anonymous, they had no way to identify me without it. I was near tears at this point. I called the same person who went with me the first time, and he ran up to Health Services with my wallet that had the number in it. He went in with me and waited while I got my results.

The paper the counselor gave me said, "HIV negative: no antibodies present." I've never felt so relieved in all my life. That truly was a weight off my mind.

Letters to the Editor

Disappointed by basketball fans

To the Editor:

I am writing to express my disappointment with the amount of spirit exhibited at UMass basketball games.

When I went to UMass, I went to all the games, made lots of noise, and supported our Minutemen 100 percent — and they were not the team they are today.

Where are the school colors? Why aren't there more banners, painted faces, noise-makers, etc.? Let's get in the game!

I don't live in the Pioneer Valley any more, so I can't participate myself. However, I feel this UMass team deserves serious, Big League support!!

Let's Go UMass!

Letters Guidelines

In order to be considered for publication, letters must be typed and must include an address and phone number for verification. Students should also include their year and major.

Due to space constraints, letters should be no more than 400 words long.

Letters can be brought to our office or mailed to the Editorial page at the Collegian.

Columnists wanted

Welcome back! As you've probably noticed, this page looks a little different this semester. The Collegian is larger, and so is this page. That means there is space for a greater variety of opinions.

That's where you come in.

The Editorial/Opinion page is looking for columnists for the spring semester. New writers should contact the Ed/Op editor today to fill out an application. You are encouraged to bring a few representative samples of your writing as well.

Last semester's columnists should come to the Collegian offices this afternoon to fill out an application for the spring. If you have a column ready for publication, bring it with you. A schedule of columnists will be posted next to the Ed/Op desk in the near future.

The Editorial/Opinion page is also looking for political cartoonists. If you are interested, bring samples of your work to the Ed/Op editor.

Applications for the position of Associate Editorial Editor are currently being accepted. Some prior experience in editing and newspapers is preferable. For more information or to fill out an application, contact the Ed/Op editor in the Collegian office.

Opinion

Welcome to the real world

Senior year of high school. Homecoming. Thanksgiving Day football game. Christmas. Prom. Graduation. College. The Real World. That's pretty much how I remember my final days at age 17. The most I had to worry about was saying goodbye to longtime friends.

Jimmy and Chris were best friends, readying themselves for what was supposed to be the last year before they became real men at the age of 18. The guys decided to head to the mall one day after school in Chris' brand new jeep — ya know, cruise around town, hang around inside and just do nothing; pretty much what I used to do when I was in Hackensack High, sans the brand new set of wheels.

Arthur Stapleton Jr.

As Jimmy and Chris left the mall and headed to the jeep, they noticed a man standing near their spot. Hey, why look at him any different? He was probably just trying to find his car — we all misplace our vehicles in parking lots. There was nothing to fear about this guy, right?

Wrong. When they approached the jeep, the stranger pulled out a gun and told them he was taking it. There was no struggle — it was pretty simple, actually. He had a gun, he was the boss. The man told the boys to get in and they did. Next stop — the side of a road in the middle of nowhere.

The man made Jimmy and Chris lie down next to each other on the grass beside the jeep with their hands behind their head. All the man wanted was the jeep, right?

Wrong. He shot Jimmy in the head. One shot was all it took. Chris was next; out of fear, he jerked his head slightly and the bullet went through his cheek. Both boys were motionless, so the man hopped in his jeep and drove off.

Chris was lucky, I guess. The jerk of his head saved his life, but he lost more than the jeep — he lost his friend.

My father sat me down one night over break and told me this story. He followed it up with a question: "What would you do if you were one of the two in the parking lot?"

For the first time in my life, I didn't have an answer for my father. "Sorry, Dad, I really don't know what I'd do."

He replied, "Don't go down without a fight. Run away, zig-zag. Do anything, don't give up that easily. You have half a chance to survive if you do. If you get in the car, you're as good as dead."

I asked my father if he knew why the man took the jeep and he said, "Would you believe it? He said his jeep had been stolen a few days earlier and he needed that jeep. He liked it."

Chris still can't cope with Jimmy's death. For the first time in his life, Chris has to do something without his best friend: become a man. Let's just hope that Chris doesn't go to the mall anytime soon and decide to pick out a new jeep like that other man did. Welcome to the real world.

Ann Landers.

What a great job she has. To those who write in with their problems, Ann gives her two cents worth on the situation. From sex to drugs to marital problems to anything and everything, Ann speaks her mind and assists others in their times of trouble. Ann must be doing something right, printed every day of the week in many newspapers across the country.

Andrew Bryce

To be honest, I am not a solidified Ann Landers fan. Don't get me wrong. Ann is probably a load of fun to be with, I just don't know her personally. What I mean to say is I don't turn straight to her advice column to tune in on other people's problems.

I do not want to call some of the people who write in deadbeat losers (well, maybe I do, but I won't), but I just can't get into a column in which a person writes and asks another person, who they don't know other than that her name is Ann, to tell them what they should do in relation to some of the biggest problems of their life.

What does this say? Ann is making money off the millions of people (I'd like to say pathetic fools, but I feel it may be inappropriate) and is probably living in style. God bless her.

Since I have no one writing to me for advice just yet, I am going to give advice on some of the important things in life. Remember, I am doing this without pay.

Don't swallow chewing tobacco — I learned that from my friend Mike when he tried. It was a mess.

Buy Busch Light — It's cheap, and if you drink it long enough, you get used to it. When I went home saying how good Busch Light was, some looked at me as if I were crazy. For 12 bucks a case, it is my choice.

While you are horsing around with your grandmother, don't tie her by her neck to the chair kiddingly, go to answer the phone, head to your room only to fall asleep, and wake up three hours later to find your Grandmother still tied to the chair — My friend accidentally did this. He didn't mean any harm, he just fell asleep. She, of course, doesn't believe him, and thinks he tried to kill her. Those family reunions must be pleasant.

Don't run up the stairs with a straw in your mouth — When I was little, I did just that and stumbled. My face fell forward and the straw went through part of the roof of my mouth. To this day, whenever my Dad sees me with a straw or toothpick in my mouth, he tells me to take it out. He was the one who pulled the straw out of the roof of my mouth.

Buy Jenga — A great game.

Lose the Sega — My friends didn't bring it up this semester. I wonder what the next nightly activity will be for them. Yahtzee, anyone?

When you get a package of striped socks for Christmas, act like it is the best present you have ever received — Five years in a row, my aunt and uncle bought me those damn socks, and five years in a row, I smiled away. They thought I was appreciative. Oh, if they only knew what I did with those socks.

If you can't be with the one you love, honey, love the one you're with — Maybe I'm just in a pessimistic mood, but at the moment, this is an example of a bad piece of advice. What if the person you are with is a disgusting, ignorant, tasteless pig?

After sitting in a hot whirlpool for an hour, don't take an ice cold shower — During my freshman year in high school, one of my teammates on the basketball team did so, and passed out in the shower. Woody was never known as one of the smartest players on the team.

If your friend's father likes to walk around the house naked in the morning, don't ever sleep over — And if you do, pretend you're asleep.

And you get paid to give advice, Ann.

Deputy chancellor cites goal of teaching

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

On Jan. 17, Marcellette Williams left Michigan State University and began her first day at work as deputy chancellor at the University of Massachusetts.

Williams completed all of her studies at Michigan State. She received her bachelors degree in comparative literature in 1968. She also earned her masters degree in comparative literature and English in 1970 and her Ph.D in comparative literature and English in 1981.

Prior to her job here at the University, Williams spent many years at Michigan State both teaching and working for the administration.

"I have always taught both undergraduate and graduate courses whether I held a position in the administration or not," Williams said.

Williams taught such undergraduate classes as introduction to literature, comparative fiction, comparative drama and intensive language courses.

She has also taught graduate level courses such as methodology of teaching English as a second language and courses that study literary criticism.

"I hope to be teaching here sometime in the near future. I would first like to see the needs of the department," Williams said.

Williams said at one point in her career at Michigan she was acting chair in the English department. Soon after, she became assistant to the provost.

"Several responsibilities I had was being involved in the internal institutional advancement, serving as a liaison coordinator among the deans, and budget strategy with the provost," Williams said.

Before Williams accepted the job at UMass, she was the executive vice-president to the president.

"I was the liaison among the executive officers," she said. She was also the corporate secretary to the board of editors and was responsible for signing off equipment leaving campus and recording historical repositories.

Not only was Williams involving herself in teaching and administering at

Although he originally began his career in teaching French at Michigan State University, Keith Williams has recently started working for the University of Massachusetts as assistant vice-chancellor for university advancement.

Williams earned both his undergraduate and graduate degrees in French language and French literature at Michigan State University. He also studied higher education administration and linguistics in doctorate level courses.

After teaching French for many years, Williams said he became highly involved with the administration at Michigan State.

"For a while I directed the orientation programs at Michigan State. I also directed a federal funded Upward Bounds program which is an equal opportunity program," Williams said.

Before Williams came to the University, he was the associate director for the alumni relations program for many years.

Williams said he met Chancellor David K. Scott on several occasions when he was at Michigan State.

"I first met him when he was provost at Michigan State. I was working in the alumni admissions and we were working close with the central admissions," Williams said.

"There was also a time when we toured all of our alumni groups in Florida and spent 10 days

Student awaits rape case appeal

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

A transfer student enrolled at the University of Massachusetts found guilty of rape is awaiting the results of an appeal.

Zaigham K. Khan, 23, formerly a student at Gettysburg (Pa.), enrolled at the University in April 1993 as a senior economics major.

Khan was found guilty by a jury in May 1993 on two counts of rape and five counts of indecent assault for events in March and August 1992, the Collegian reported in December.

Khan appealed the decision with a hearing date set for Dec. 30, 1993. The appeal is based in part on the consolidation of two cases into one trial and failure to admit the women's past sexual history into the trial, according to the documents submitted by his lawyer, Michael George.

Gettysburg College barred Khan from campus after the rape charges were brought against him, requiring Khan to be escorted onto campus by a college official.

The University Admissions Office said Khan was accepted before he was found guilty and they did not know of the charges brought against him.

The University Registrar's Office said Khan is enrolled at UMass for the spring semester.

The appeal process is not yet complete, said Martha Duvall, assistant district attorney of Adams County, Pa.

She said George submitted a brief to Judge John Kuhn, but she herself has not yet filed a brief.

Duvall said she has been unable to finish her brief because she has been occupied with other criminal trials. Also, she said her office had been closed for several days due to inclement weather.

Duvall said she expects to submit her brief by early next week at the latest. Once Kuhn has both lawyers' briefs, he will then make a ruling on Khan's appeal.

ABCC levies fine on liquor store

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

"During a routine undercover investigation at Four Seasons Wine/Liquors in September, agents confiscated two cases of beer from a 20-year-old University of Massachusetts student.

The state Alcohol Beverage Control Commission held a hearing on Nov. 23, in Boston, which Four Seasons owners Richard and Peter Krupczak attended.

The ABCC ruling, which came down in December, ordered the Krupczaks to surrender their license for six days or pay a fine based on a percentage of six days worth of receipts. They also were given the option of appealing to the Superior Court within 30 days.

Richard Krupczak said they decided to pay the fine, although he refused to give the amount. He said the appeal seemed to be more trouble than it would probably be worth.

The ABCC frequently checks liquor stores and bars throughout the commonwealth. Krupczak said the ABCC stops by three or four times a year and checks people out randomly.

Krupczak said he was aware that the undercover agents were there and the license looked legitimate so he accepted it.

The student used a fake Connecticut driver's license and was questioned by agents. Krupczak said the license was a duplicate with the students picture and someone else's information.

"They'd never have known until he broke down and admitted it was fake," Krupczak said. "If he lasted another five minutes, he would've been in his car, driving away."

He also said the commission admitted there was no way to tell the license was false. According to the ABCC, the only acceptable form of identification is a Massachusetts state driver's license and liquor stores are required to ask for one if they have any questions about a customer's age.

Krupczak said from now on the store will only accept out-of-state licenses with another form of picture identification.

together. He was the speaker and I was there to introduce him. This is where we had a chance to talk about institutional advancement," he said.

Williams was hired as the associate vice chancellor for the university advancement, and will be working for Vice Chancellor.

"A university's future is not assured and the message of the university has to get out there to help assure its future. The advancement office performs the activities that advance the institution and promote the institution," Williams said.

The main job Williams said he will be concentrating on is promoting the institution among its various constitutes and its supporters.

"Those constitutes are all those who have an invested interest in the institution. For example tax payers, the legislators and parents of students," Williams said.

Williams said his job is to help get the message of the institution to receive support. "We have to get the message out to advance the institutions reputation," he said.

The first goal in which Williams wants to achieve is to learn more about the University.

"I want to become more aware about what is presently being done around campus. Especially in the area of publications," Williams said.

Another goal in which Williams is going to concentrate on is improving the image of the University. "Ultimately, I hope to help raise and improve the image of the institution," he said.

"Right now we are in tight budget times and we need to focus on private fund raising and increase state appropriations. So hopefully the things I will be doing will result in helping increase of funds," Williams said.

Farrakhan to speak at FAC

Students divided over controversial minister's visit

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Staff

When Malcolm X was asked if he was militant, he smiled and replied: "No, I am Malcolm."

The question for today could be asked: Is Louis Farrakhan militant, or is he just Louis?

No matter which side is chosen, when orator and Minister Louis Farrakhan talks, people listen. He will be speaking in the Fine Arts Center on March 12.

The Student Government Association voted to grant the Black Student Union $2,000 to bring the minister to speak. The total cost of bringing Farrakhan to UMass is $15,000; $5,000 will pay for the security force Farrakhan will bring with him.

> "You don't have to believe everything he says. He says it for shock value, and people listen."
> – Al Lizana, student trustee

Farrakhan, the leader of the Nation of Islam, started his rise to power in 1964 when Malcolm X broke ties with the Nation of Islam and its founder, the Honorable Elijah Muhammad.

An apprentice of Malcolm X, Farrakhan was recommended to head the Boston Temple. In May 1965, after the murder of Malcolm X, the Honorable Elijah Muhammad appointed Farrakhan as the Minister of Iemple 7, that had previously been under Malcolm X's leadership.

Farrakhan's temple became the strongest Temple in the Nation of islam. Under Farrakhan, the Temple opened 17 businesses, 3 schools, 5 temples and many other temples throughout the New York vicinity.

The Islamic Nation, according to writer John F. Davis who interviewed Farrakhan, has three main goals: Total freedom for all African-Americans, equal justice for all regardless of creed or color and equality of opportunity.

As Farrakhan comes to speak, his statements ignite a fire of controversy which follows him wherever he goes. Many believe him to be anti-Semitic, and the Anti-Defamation League of B'Nai B'Rith has issued a booklet on Farrakhan's views as "violent hostility towards Whites and Jews in particular." The ADL says that his words show that he appeals to "bigotry and racism."

In the pamphlet from the ADL, Farrakhan is quoted as saying: "if the truth hurts. . . members of the Jewish community. . . I cannot apologize for it, because the truth offends the guilty [Chicago Sun-Times, July 19]."

On Feb. 18, 1990, Farrakhan told 4,000 people at Michigan State University that Jews were "sucking the blood of the black community," and in a speech in New York on May 21, 1988, as reported in the New York Post, Farrakhan said, "narrow minded-common Jews. . . The Jews cannot defeat me so I will grind them and crush then into little bits."

"I have never heard him say that they are evil people," said Douglas Greer, a member of Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity.

In 1988, when Jesse Jackson was accused of making anti- Semitic remarks through the use of the word "hymie" by Washington Post reporter Milton Coleman, Farrakhan came to Jackson's defense stating that, "one day soon we will punish you (Coleman) with death." Jackson then separated himself from Farrakhan's remarks about Coleman, but did not denounce his ideology.

Farrakhan has also been quoted as saying homophobic statements. In the ADL handbook, Farrakhan was quoted as saying: "Look at you. . . A man trying to be a woman. . . A woman trying to be a man," from a speech in Denver Colorado as reported by the Rocky Mountain News, Dec. 15, 1989.

"Our country is beset by racism and economic injustice that causes terrible suffering," said Rabbi Saul Perlmutter of the Hillel House. "Farrakhan addresses important issues, but in a way that gets people of different races, religions and sexual orientations against one another. His division adds to the problem rather than a solution."

Farrakhan and many of his followers believe that the accusations are because of the news media distorting statements, and taking them out of context. Many believe that his feelings toward Jewish people may be wrong, but his social and economic prescriptions for the African- American community are constructive.

"Farrakhan is a response to racism, he wouldn't have a following if there wasn't any racism in society," said William Strickland, an Afro-American studies professor. "The fundamental issue is that people have the right to their own leadership."

"You don't have to believe everything he says," said Al Lizana, student trustee. "He says it for shock value, and people listen." He said Farrakhan's message tells the African-American community to be successful.

"The only way to characterize his message is to see him," Lizana said. "He is a catalyst for discussion. Speakers like him force people to talk about issues honestly. Both groups can walk away learning something."

Minister Farrakhan continues his message of economic rebirth and self improvement through his "Black Agenda," a program that calls for assertion of human rights in order for African-Americans to attain justice and equal opportunity under the law.

Michigan State University the past 10 years, she also taught and consulted graduate studies on language and literature in Asia.

"I have taught in many countries throughout Asia such as Korea, Japan, Taiwan, Hong Kong and Indonesia," Williams said.

Williams first met Chancellor Scott when he was a professor in physics. A reception was held to acknowledge and honor certain professors.

"I also talked with Chancellor Scott when I was an officer of the chapter Phi Beta Kappa, which is one of the oldest National Honor Organizations, and he was being initiated," Williams said.

"When I talked to him there, he was the provost at Michigan. There I recognized his ideas he had and his energy for conveying those ideas," Williams said.

In 1988, Williams worked on a fellowship with the American Council on Education in UCLA. The fellowship was to learn more about leadership and higher education in American society.

"Part of the fellowship was to have an internship. For the internship we had to select a mentor which had to be a leader in higher education to work with in the course of the year. Chancellor Scott was one of the mentors i chose," she said.

Williams will be overseeing the long-range institutional planning on campus. She will also be the one to serve in the absence of the Chancellor.

"i will have general responsibilities as well as specific responsibilities," she said. "We have responsibilities as an institution to sharper the resources of the state, the people of the state and the students who attend the University, in a way that allows for quality education in the best environment we can establish."

"I have a firm commitment to public higher education. I am very excited to be here at UMass," Williams said.

End of construction in sight

Polymer research center completion date set for June

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

The Silvio O. Conte National Center for Polymer Research, located on Governor's Drive, might be finished by the end of the year, according to Jim Cahill, director of planning and facility development. The building has been under construction for the past two years.

The building is named for the late Rep. Silvio O. Conte, a local legislator who was instrumental in lobbying the state for the money to build the center.

The ground on which the building stands was dedicated by Gov. William Weld in a ceremony on July 31, 1991. The event was also attended by Jeanne Conte, widow of Silvio O. Conte, and various local politicians.

The building's price tag of $56 million is being paid by the government. The state is paying $16 million and the federal government is paying the remaining $20 million.

According to Cahill, the construction firm of R.W. Granger is building the center. The contract specifies June of 1994 as the projected completion date.

"The business of building buildings is riddled with problems," Cahill said. "These projects have a way of getting delayed."

The center will be the new home of the polymer science research department. At present, the department is scattered throughout Goessman, Lederle Graduate Research Tower and other locations across the campus. It is mostly made up of graduate and post-doctoral students.

The building will consist of two wings. One will be offices for the faculty and researchers in the department and the other will be the laboratory wing.

Instrument, chemical, wet bench and physics labs will all be included in the laboratory support wing. There will also be two teaching labs. Cahill said he thinks the department will schedule the classes that will be held in those labs.

The Department of Defense granted the money to fund the center's construction, but Cahill said that all research conducted in the building will be available for publication.

Although final decisions have yet to be reached, Cahill said there are preliminary plans to equip the building with a security card access system.

"The security will only be for the night and off-hours," Cahill said. "During the rest of the time it will be free and unencumbered."

He said the security system will not be too complex because the faculty does not want it. The reason for it is because of the vast quantity of expensive research equipment.

The arch in front of the building is a strictly architectural feature. It is an arcade with a sidewalk underneath, and it will be lighted.

"That's a little architectural delight," Cahill said.

The architectural firms involved in the planning of the building are Ellen Zweig Associates out of Cambridge and Whitney Atwood Norcross out of Boston.

The area in front of the building will also be highly landscaped. The fall planting has been completed and Cahill said the spring planting should move on schedule.

Cahill said there has been no extension of the projected completion date and the center will hopefully be open for business in Sept. 94.

Are You Buyer Material?
If you have designs on a career that offers stability and exciting growth potential, the T.J. Maxx Buyer Development Program will suit you perfectly.
T.J. Maxx began as a two-store operation in 1977. Today we are a $2.5 billion retailing powerhouse with over 500 locations coast to coast—and we're growing at the rate of 45-50 new stores each year. And that means stability, growth and opportunity for creative, analytical people who thrive on challenge.
In this executive training program, you won't work your way up to the corporate level, you'll start there. Your first step towards becoming a T.J. Maxx Buyer will be to join us at our Corporate Headquarters in Framingham, MA as a Merchandise Analyst.
Here, your strong decision-making skills and creativity will directly impact the merchandise mix in our nationwide network of stores. And, you'll receive on-the-job training and support as you work your way up to Buyer.
As a division of The TJX Companies, Inc., T.J. Maxx has the resources to provide competitive starting salaries, amenities that feature a full-service cafeteria, fitness center and on-site day care facility, plus excellent benefits including comprehensive insurance and financial plans, tuition assistance, merchandise discounts and more.
Join us at our Information Session on Wednesday, February 16th from 7:00-9:00 pm at the Lord Jeffrey Inn, where you can learn more about T.J. Maxx's Buyer Development Program. We will be conducting on-campus interviews Thursday, February 17th. We look forward to seeing you.

Playing field nearly level

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY

The University of Massachusetts is adding women's water polo and crew teams and increasing funding of women's programs in its plan to meet the Title IX requirements for equal funding of men and women's athletics.

Last year, men's sports received $1,626,462 and women's sports received $1,143,443. The University will increase women's funding by $500,000 to bring the two figures closer together. The crew and water polo teams will share $374,000 of the new funds.

"By taking these steps, the University will be a leader in providing equal opportunity to women students on the athletic field," said Chancellor David K. Scott. UMass officials expect to be in full compliance with Title IX requirements within five years.

The federal Department of Health and Education passed Title IX in 1972. The law reads: "No person shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving federal financial assistance."

The law is usually associated with sports, and particularly women in college athletics. University of Massachusetts, joining the ranks of Brown University and Cornell University, was accused of violating Title IX and last year settled out of court to reinstate women's tennis, lacrosse and volleyball.

Required by law to have an equal number of men's and women's teams, the University currently has 15 women's teams and 14 teams for men. Under Title IX, male to female student and athlete ratios should be 50-50. The University enrollment is 52 percent male to 48 percent female the athlete ratio is 54.8 percent male to 45.2 percent female.

In addition, universities must offer equal access to sports for males and females, including access to scholarships, practice time, equipment and transportation.

UMass management doctoral candidate Carol A. Barr served as the Title IX consultant to a UMass study commissioned by Athletic Director Bob Marcum.

"It is not the intent to raise women's teams and cut the men," Barr said. "Adding programs for both is the true intention."

Barr's study stated that while scholarship aid is fairly equal, the main problem is participation rates: more men than women take part in college athletics.

> "It is not the intent to raise women's teams and cut the men. Adding programs for both is the true intention."
> – Carol A Barr
> UMass management doctoral candidate

While the University appears to be willing to enforce Title IX, it cannot the control popularity or media coverage. Women's soccer or lacrosse games only attract a mild crowd, but men's basketball helps attract a brand new arena and a audience of fans.

Some members of the women's basketball team claim they don't get enough coverage from the Collegian and other media.

"I've learned to accept it — it has always been like that," said Cherie L. Muza, a senior guard for the Minutewomen. "People don't want to read about it. The stigma is that women's sports are boring."

Most media and fans argue that men's basketball receives because it is the most successful sport at the University and generates the most funds. For the media, the men's team attracts more advertising, the primary source of media income.

Muza said the Collegian promised the women's basketball team a pull-out preview section separate than that for the men's team.

"The team was told that there would be a pull-out preview within our special sports weekend section," said Art Stapleton Jr., Collegian sports editor. "We did not include the Minutewomen in the men's issue because it came out weeks ahead of the start of [the women's] season.

"With the expected success of the team, we felt that something separate and special was needed. This was the first time the Collegian devoted a section to the Minutewoman basketball team. They deserved it. Hopefully, it is a sign of things to

Hooker weds, party at Mullins

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY

It was a romance made in heaven. Or in other words, at a University of Massachusetts basketball game.

Michael K. Hooker, president of the five campuses in the UMass system, and State Rep. Carmen Buell tied the knot on Jan. 18 in a small, private, "non-traditional" wedding ceremony at the Leyden United Methodist Church.

The two met at a basketball game at the Springfield Civic Center. Although the team lost to Cincinnati, the couple solidified their relationship a year later.

The wedding was followed by a reception at the William D. Mullins Center overlooking the basketball court. The 200 guests at the reception were treated to jazz played by the member of the Minuteman Hoop Band, and to a spread of food that included scallops, crab legs and a five-layer carrot cake prepared by UMass Catering. The couple rented the reception area for the standard renting fee of $100.

The couple found it would be fitting to get married in a church in Buell's district. Hooker and Buell drove through every town in her district before finally choosing Leydon.

Hooker and the now Carmen Hooker Buell, created their own ceremony and the service did not include a best man or main of honor. However, the service featured Hooker's daughter, Alex, singing "Greensleeves" and the couple was showered with birdseed upon leaving the church.

At the reception, Gov. William F. Weld's humorous proclamation honoring the couple was read by the chairman of the UMass Board of Trustees, Dan Taylor. Part of the proclamation read: "Whereas Rep. Buell and Dr. Hooker were first introduced at a UMass basketball game, proving that everything within Coach Calipari's grasp turns to gold." Guests included Chancellor David K. Scott, basketball Coach John Calipari, Rep. Ellen Story (D-Amherst) and Sen. Stanley Rosenberg (D-Amherst).

Hooker wore a black pinstriped suit and a print tie. Buell wore a cream colored gown. The couple honeymooned in Palm Springs.

In a statement to the Daily Hampshire Gazette, Hooker said: "We picked the Mullins Center partly because of basketball, but we also wanted to display our commitment to the University."

Acting on this information, an entire bike was found, as well as two bicycles with missing front wheels and other bike parts.

Police estimated the recovered equipment at a value up to $1,700.

Police also concluded the bikes found in Thornell's room were either being disassembled to sell the parts individually or refitted to be sold as a complete bicycle.

Thornell was arrested and charged with four counts of receiving stolen property valued at more than $250, police said.

"We are now looking for owners of various bikes found. We found several intact and many bicycle parts," Luippold said.

Stephen Sherman received an unusual holiday present this year. He was the lucky recipient of a personalized gallon jug of Tabasco sauce.

Sherman, a 1990 graduate of the University of Massachusetts and a native of Wilbraham, Ma., was the first place winner in the student division of the second Tabasco Hottest Chef Recipe Contest.

In addition to the jug of Tabasco, he also received $500 in cash. Sherman said this money was "like a scholarship" because it would go to pay for his continuing education at the Culinary Institute of America.

The winning recipe was "Seafood Ragout" a combination of fresh fish, clams and mussels sautéed with vegetables, herbs and Tabasco pepper sauce, served over angel hair pasta.

This recipe was created by Sherman while vacationing at his parent's home in Block Island, R.I. He said for the past three or four years, he would go clamming and catch the ingredients to make the dish for visiting friends and relatives.

He also said the recipe is a long time favorite at late night gatherings with his friends.

He learned of the contest through flyers distributed at the Institute. The contest required entrants to submit a dish that would serve 12 people.

The new student division was added to the contest this year to recognize chefs of tomorrow. The entries were judged on flavor, originality and creativity, nutritional balance, method and presentation.

Sherman graduated with bachelors degrees in history and political science. He said his interest in the culinary arts began while waiting tables when he was a student at UMass.

After his graduation in 1990, Sherman worked at the Northampton Brewery for a year before moving on to New York.

He is currently fulfilling an externship requirement at the Union Square Cafe in New York City. He said he plans to graduate in September and would like to be an executive chef in a restaurant.

"I'd love to open my own restaurant, but that is such a huge financial burden," Sherman said. "I would like to be an executive chef at a restaurant someday."

The contest judges included Richard Geldart, director of foodservices sales and marketing for McIlhenny Company, makers of Tabasco pepper sauce, Peter Krump, owner of Peter Krump Cooking School, Rick Moonen, chef of the Water Club, and Tim Ryan, C.M.C., vice president of education at The Culinary Institute of America.

Ex–dean tapped for post

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

On Jan. 9, Melanie C. Dreher, former dean and professor of the School of Nursing at the University of Massachusetts, was elected President of the Sigma Theta Tau International.

STTI is an honor society for nursing. The society's purpose is to help increase the scientific base of nursing practice, the scientific knowledge of nursing research and health care delivery in order to improve public health worldwide.

In order to become a member of STTI, a person must be invited. The invitations are based on students who are in graduate and baccalaureate nursing programs. The person must also show excellence in leadership, scholarship and have reached other various excellent achievements in nursing.

In a recent press release, Dreher explained the importance of STTI to medical research.

"Many citizens continue to be unaware of the profoundly important contributions of nursing scholarship in generating affordable solutions to the most pervasive health problems affecting individuals, families and communities," Dreher said.

"The fact that the public is a ready consumer of medical research but comparatively unaware of nursing research is a problem that Sigma Theta Tau International has both the responsibility and the power to address," she said.

"While continuing to emphasize and support the role of academic nursing, Sigma Theta Tau International is the logical forum for the advancement of research and scholarship in non–academic settings, where the majority of nurses are to be found," Dreher said.

Dreher graduated from the Long Island University School of Nursing in 1967. She received her doctorate in anthropology from Columbia University in 1977. Dreher first started working for the University in 1988.

Dreher is well known for her health research on substance abuse in Jamaica in order to preserve family life. She studied and analyzed the children of mothers in Jamaica addicted to crack cocaine.

Dreher has been doing extensive research in Jamaica for the past 23 years. In both the spring of 1994 and '95, Dreher will be completing her research.

She has also done many other studies researching substance abuse. One study Dreher was involved in was for the March of Dimes Foundation in 1980. The research involved studying children in pre–school of mothers using marijuana and kids using marijuana themselves.

Dreher has also received a Senior International Fellowship which was sponsored by the Fogarty International Center.

Dreher will first serve a two–year term on the board of directors as president–elect. She will then begin her role of presidency in 1995 and continue until 1997.

Weld blocks higher education bill

Early retirement incentive for state employees vetoed

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

An early retirement program for state employees working in higher education was vetoed by Gov. William F. Weld last week. It was passed by the Legislature as part of a $118 million supplemental budget.

Weld vetoed the bill at the last possible moment, allowing no time for an override by the Legislature. To date, public higher education is still the last government sector to be offered the early retirement incentive.

Simon Keochakian, president of the UMass Amherst chapter of the Service Employees International Union Local 509, said legislature has already been filed for the next legislative session, in anticipation of a possible veto.

Keochakian, a staff psychologist in the office for Counseling and Academic Development, said the union was outraged at Weld's maneuver and hopes to push the bill through at a later date.

"It's a fairness issue," Keochakian said. "Clearly the governor is not dealing with higher education as he has with other state employees."

He said Weld vetoed the bill using cost as an issue, but said this was a poor argument. "[Gov. Weld] doesn't understand the full cost," Keochakian said. "It's cost saving because you replace expensive staff with less expensive."

The bill, which provided for the retirement of almost 900 workers throughout the five–campus University of Massachusetts system, also included a provision that the State Board of Retirement complete a study looking at the costs associated with the plan.

Under the program, employees would have to apply from March 15 to April 15 to be eligible, and they would have to retire by June 30.

The state would foot the bill for the base cost of the program, but the campuses would be required to pay unused sick leave and accumulated vacation time.

The campus would be allowed to refill up to 75 percent of the faculty posts vacated and up to 50 percent of positions in administrative and classified staff positions. These refills would have to be approved by House and Senate committees.

Jeremiah Allen, a professor in the English department, said he believes it is unfair that public higher education employees are the only group that do not have the option of early retirement available.

Allen, secretary of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, said the program is one that many members would be interested in making available to themselves.

"We hope something will come out of the next session so members can have the opportunity of early retirement if they want it," Allen said.

Allen said he hopes local legislators, such as Rep. Ellen Story (D–Amherst), again take an interest in helping to pass the bill.

Your Horoscope
By Joana Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Vigilance is essential if you feel your way of life is being threatened. Keep a close eye on expenditures. Common sense is the glue that binds practical partners together.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): Keeping to a work schedule conscientiously makes it easier for you to turn out good products. A favorite hobby could provide a second income. Enlist the cooperation of small fry when entertaining.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): A pending event or developing trend could be cause for concern. Those who are united should be able to ward off a takeover. Business pals are relying on your leadership.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): Keep pressing until you have accumulated all the data deemed desirable. Someone could be trying to stir things up behind the scenes.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): The only remedy for a tight financial situation is to emphasize thrift and economical habits. A sound investment may be found with the help of the experts. An evening phone call sends your spirit soaring.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Doing one's job and cooperating in a friendly manner will make the day pass in a pleasant and profitable way. Do not neglect essentials.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Between the two emotions that grip you, heed the one that counsels caution and moderation. Acting on impulse will only lead to trouble. Routine tasks can become monotonous.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Now is not the time to change careers — give yourself another few months. If you feel that you are running on empty, eliminate non–essential activities.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec 21): It is possible that someone has misinterpreted your actions. Try a new tack when dealing with higher–ups. An open–minded approach could lead to exciting educational opportunities.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): Act confidently and decisively to solve problems in record time. Plunge into new activities with an eager, wholehearted approach. Romance is perplexing.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20–Feb 18): Remember your decision to be flexible and versatile. Refuse to put all of your eggs in one basket. Keep the lines of communication open.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Set an example for others to follow. Love what you do, do what you love and let the world go its own way. When necessary, assert your authority in a positive manner.

Tutorial center to open in fall

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

According to a retention committee at the University of Massachusetts and campus statistics, UMass has lost 18 to 23 percent of its first–year students after their first year at school in the last decade.

After a report on the situation, a request was made two fiscal years ago to set up a tutorial center for the campus.

Norman Aitken, deputy provost, said the tutorial center will provide a university tutoring program.

The center will be located on the 10th floor of the tower library and will open in fall 1994.

"The center came from recommendations of the retention committee supported by the Faculty Senate and the provost," Aitken said.

The University had many goals when designing the program. One was to help retain incoming students after their first academic year is over.

Humberto Segura, who previously worked for the multimedia supervisor for learning support services at the University of Houston, Texas, has been hired to set up and direct the center.

"My primary objective is to put a comprehensive program that will aid the students learning in how to learn more effectively and efficiently. In today's academic environment, it is very competitive. I would like to help bring the students that edge to succeed," Segura said.

"We wanted to provide services that occur on most campuses that are not provided here. We wanted to work on improving tutorial support for students," Aitken said.

The state will appropriate funding for the center.

"The money for the center is not being taken from any other program. It will not lead to any increase in student tuition fees. It will be a free service," Aitken said.

Part of the center would provide a tutor training program. Aitken said UMass does not have a training program on campus to certify tutors.

"The students have never been trained to tutor. There is a lot to tutoring other than knowing the material," Aitken said. "We would provide a university–wide tutoring training program that we would recommend students to take that program so they would be certified," Aitken said.

Another part of the center would develop a tutoring program for students based heavily on freshman courses.

"The center is not designed to replace other department tutoring programs. It is designed to fill in where there is no tutoring and to work with departments that have tutoring to improve the effect it will serve," Aitken said.

"We will have a very structural training program for tutors and they will be able to obtain a certification. There will be different levels of certification," Segura said.

Segura said there will be different tutors trained for specific learning styles as well as ethnic groups and learning problems.

They will also have tutors go to classrooms and take notes in order to have full knowledge of what they are helping students with. The tutors will provide learning styles of reasoning, skills and good note–taking.

Segura said they are hoping to start training this spring semester. Anyone can go through this training, but only those who actually work for the center will be paid.

The center will also help tutor students through computers. The computers will have many software programs and provide assistant instruction.

"They will be used to enhance their learning and to build up their skills where they are weak," Aitken said.

One example in which the computers will assist students is in their foreign language classes. "It will help brush up on a specific aspect the student is having trouble with," Aitken said.

"The end result will hopefully improve the retention rates of the University," Segura said.

SGA fighting possible tuition hike

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

In the next two weeks, the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association will attempt to rally students to join them in their fight to lower tuition, increase the state financial aid pool and to battle for a higher state appropriation for the University system, according to the undergraduate student speaker.

Speaker Matthew Pavesi said senators will be going door– to–door to educate students, and to convince them to go to the SGA office to call their state representatives and senators and voice their concerns about the high cost of attending UMass. Tuition has increased 166 percent over the past five years, Pavesi said.

"[Vice chancellor for Administration and Finance] Paul Page stated earlier this year that the University would be going for a 4 percent tuition increase, which would be an increase of about $85 or $90," Pavesi said.

"That may not sound like a big increase, but it may be a lot for an inner–city kid who has scraped up enough money to come here by working two jobs and getting some financial aid."

Pavesi said the SGA hopes 10,000 calls will be made to state representatives and senators from UMass before July. He said he is optimistic students will take the time to make the phone calls because it is an issue that affects everyone.

"This is an issue that hits the pocketbooks; every student is affected by a tuition increase," he said. "We've had it with tuition increases. We know that it costs a lot to educate people, but the cost shouldn't be put on the students."

Pavesi said the SGA will demand that the Higher Education Coordinating Committee, the group that sets the tuition increase rate each year, set the rate at zero percent. Last February, HECC set the increase rate at 2 to 4 percent and the University Board of Trustees voted for a 4 percent increase, Pavesi said. He said the SGA campaign will urge HECC to set the rate at zero percent and the trustees to approve a zero percent increase in tuition for next year.

Pavesi said the SGA will also be lobbying state legislators to increase the state financial aid pool to $100 million, a measure he said would allow UMass to recruit and retain more students from poorer backgrounds.

He also said the SGA will campaign to increase the state's five–college appropriation from $311 million to a level that is comparable to public colleges in other states.

He said the Massachusetts legislature ranks next–to–last in the amount of funding it gives to its University system.

the broken flask.

When Ferrer was contacted back in the lab a few days after the incident he said he was doing well, and had returned to his experiments.

"It was an accident, I'm okay," he said. "I'm back now, working in the lab."

At the time of the incident he had been working "under the hood," which provides protection from fumes, and explosions like the one that occurred. He had also been wearing safety glasses and protective gloves.

The chemistry department said they emphasize and teach safety to all students. Professor Louis Carpino said he agreed that safety was something an experimenter is aware of, but there is still the danger of an accident like this one to occur.

"You've got to keep your eyes open," Carpino said. "He'd done it before and nothing happened. It's a reaction that people do all the time."

Although the department recommends that a person not work alone in the lab in case of an accident, Ferrer was alone at the time because his lab partner was away for winter break.

Ferrer also said the explosion was not that powerful but pointed out that "the sound of the explosion was strong, the amount in the flask was very small, a few milliliters."

Carpino said as a safety precaution in this particular case a person could "possibly cool the reactants or add them more slowly."

■ Scott

Scott said he believes hiring the Williamses was essential.

"We will be having to make additional investments in the area of University advancement if we are going to carry out a successful campaign over the next few years," he said.

In addition to faculty lost during the past five years for budget reasons, Scott said further reductions in faculty staffing may be necessary.

"In the future, we are probably likely to end up with fewer people in the University that we had before. Several hundreds of people have not been replaced when they left the University," Scott said.

Scott said in order to improve the private support of the University, there must be more administrators to do the job.

"You can't raise money without having people out there who are going to be doing all of the research and making all the contacts that are needed," he said.

New service eases job search

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

The Mather Career Center has just recently started an electronic resume referral service at the University of Massachusetts called the Resume Expert Job/Employee Matching System.

This service will help alumni and students who are looking for jobs find them more easily. It will also help organizations in need of employees locate workers who are qualified and searching for jobs.

"The old-fashioned way of student looking at job openings posted on bulletin boards is obsolete," said Joan Stoia, director of the career center, in a recent press release.

The service can be purchased in a software package for a one-time charge of $20.

The program can be used on any IBM-compatible computer. The students and alumni can write their job preferences and resumes on completed data diskettes and send them to the career center.

Once the center receives the files, they download them onto its computer into the system. Once this is done the disks are returned to the users of the program.

"The Resume Expert Job/Employee Matching System allows us to respond in a fast and flexible way to the small- and mid-sized employers who are generating most of the new jobs," Stoia said.

In order for an employer to use the system they call the career center with a specific job description of a co-op or a job opening. The computer database then scans for people with the skills and experience who matches the description.

Once the match is made, the career center faxes the resumes to the employer.

"When an employer makes a request, it's possible for us to have the resume of a UMass student or alumni on the employer's desk within an hour," Stoia said.

The Resume Expert Job/Employee Matching System has over 110 colleges and universities from all over the country in its program.

Stoia concluded that over 1,800 employers call the center with job opportunities each year and expects the numbers to increase with this new system.

"The majority of organizations in the 'new workplace' are smaller and leaner, and they are not producing the brand- name kind of consumer goods or services that students would necessarily recognize. Rather than going to work for large multi-national corporations, this generation of college grads will more likely find jobs with smaller companies," Stoia said.

Stoia said student's resumes will benefit from the center because the program helps them in step-by-step instruction in resume-writing. "Users provide the content; the program takes care of the format," Stoia said.

Students and alumni can use the system even after they have a job and want to search for another one. The person just has to send their updated resumes back to the center in order to be run through the computer system.

"The system will enable the career center to cut the response time to decision-makers who call the center with job openings or co-ops," Stoia said.

Stoia said this new system will be a great help for UMass students looking for a job.

"If there is a group of people who have reasonably good job prospects relative to other groups, it is college graduates," Stoia said.

Lab explosion in Grad Tower injures student

By DAVID GLEESON
Collegian Staff

On Jan. 11, a University of Massachusetts student was injured in the Lederle Graduate Research Center when an experiment he was conducting went awry, causing a small explosion which resulted in flying glass.

Fernando Ferrer, a doctoral student in chemistry, suffered cuts on his forearm and face and minor chemical burns when a glass flask with chemicals he was using in an experiment became "overpressurized" and broke in the resulting explosion.

Ferrer, who was treated at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton required eight stitches for the injuries on his forearm and finger. He indicated that he was familiar with the reaction and unsure of what had gone wrong.

"I've made it several times," said Ferrer. "Perhaps [this time] the material was more pure, the reaction was faster."

After the accident occurred emergency personnel arrived and evacuated the building for approximately 25 minutes as a precaution. There was no fire or poisonous fumes from the accident, and the only damage to the lab was

Minutemen rise to No. 6, fall to DePaul

By Jeff Crofts and Arthur Stapleton Jr.
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

As usual, it was a busy winter session for the Massachusetts men's basketball team. The Minutemen, after opening the break with a solid two weeks of practice, went on to post an 8–1 mark during the vacation, along with obtaining their highest ranking ever in the Associated Press NCAA Division I poll (No. 6).

Before we focus on UMass' next contest, a date tomorrow night (7:30 p.m., ESPN) at the Cincinnati Bearcats, here is a Collegian recap of those eight games:

Massachusetts 81, Hartford 62

SPRINGFIELD — The opening round of the Abdow's Hall of Fame Classic has traditionally been a game in which the Minutemen battled a cream puff. This one was no different. Nonetheless, it was a big one for UMass because it marked the return of freshman center Marcus Camby, who injured his knee against North Carolina earlier in the year.

Camby did not disappoint. The big man from Hartford pounded his hometown college, scoring 13 points, snagging seven rebounds and swatting away eight Hawk shots. Junior guard Mike Williams, another Hartford native, led the Minutemen in scoring with 21 points. Hartford posed no real threat to UMass during anytime of the contest.

Massachusetts 84, Maryland 80

SPRINGFIELD — In one of the most entertaining games of the season so far, the UMass defense stifled the young and extremely talented Terrapins when it needed to and came away with a very impressive 14–point victory in the Abdow's Hall of Fame Classic championship game.

Williams, the Abdow's Hall of Fame MVP, destroyed Maryland with his dribbling penetration as he tallied 25 points, 10 assists and seven rebounds in the victory. Junior forward Lou Roe, a major beneficiary of Williams' passing, poured in 30 points and pulled down eight rebounds. Maryland, which has proved it can run past anyone in the country, was led by super freshman Joe Smith, who scored 26 for the Terrapins.

Massachusetts 71, Rutgers 58

PISCATAWAY, NJ — The night before, then–No.23 George Washington traveled to Olean, N.Y., for a date with the underdog Bonnies of St. Bonaventure. The Colonials left with a loss which cost them their national ranking.

Amidst a snow and ice storm that hit the East Coast earlier in the day, Massachusetts looked to avoid a similar fate. Coach Bob Wenzel's Scarlet Knights put forth by far their best effort of the season, but fell short to the much quicker Minutemen. Camby continued his assault in the paint, collecting eight blocks to go along with his 13–point, eight rebound, four–assist performance.

Freshman center Marcus Camby returned to the court for Massachusetts and quickly made an impact. He blocked eight shots in two of his first three games back for the Minutemen.

UMass won for only the second time at the Louis Brown Athletic Center, better known as the RAC, in the Calipari era.

Massachusetts 70, Duquesne 53

In the past two seasons, UMass teams characteristically had problems with noon games, so the road contest against the Dukes and their star, Derrick Alston, had some fans worried. Not the Minutemen.

But Roe got in early foul trouble in the first half, forcing him to the bench and Calipari to look somewhere else in his offense for points. Junior point guard Derek Kellogg had his best game of the year statistically, scoring 11 points while snagging seven caroms and six swipes.

The highlight of the contest was a spectacular inbounds play from underneath UMass' own offensive hoop when Camby took a lob pass from just inside the foul line and jammed it home. He finished with 12 points and five rebounds. Sophomore Donta Bright led the Minutemen with 15 points.

Massachusetts 70, West Virginia 56

MORGANTOWN, W.VA. — This was supposed to be a tough one. After all, West Virginia entered the contest in the midst of a nine– game winning streak and the WVU Coliseum is always a tough place to play. However, the Minutemen played some very tough D, never really allowed the rowdy crowd into it and took over sole possession of first place in the Atlantic 10 with a convincing 14–point victory.

Junior forward Dana Dingle led the way for UMass, as

Kellogg proves his point on the court

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

Massachusetts point guard Derek Kellogg can't shoot. He won't shoot because he's afraid. He couldn't drop one in the ocean. Why is he even in there? Kellogg is obviously the weak link in the backcourt.

Critics who watched the 6–foot–3 junior co–captain last season cried mediocrity, calling for Minuteman Coach John Calipari to bench the guy who wouldn't take the open shot.

Enter 1994, the start of a new year and a new philosophy from Kellogg, which has kept him atop the Atlantic 10 leaders in three–point field goal percentage (52 percent). New uniforms, same number, different player.

"I think last year people had a right to complain that I wasn't shooting the ball enough when I had the open shot," Kellogg said. "Now, that's my job on this team — to lead the team and to take open shots. If the shots are open, I have the confidence now that I'm going to hit 'em."

As a freshman, he was the back–up to Mike Williams, his current backcourt mate. Only problem: Williams was the second–string point guard to then–team leader senior Anton Brown. Last season, Kellogg took over the reins relinquished by Brown, mainly because of his dependability and the coaching staff's decision to move Williams to two–guard.

Still, the sophomore starter only attempted 57 3–point field goals, hitting 19 of them for 33 percent. So far this season, Kellogg has nailed 30, including four–trey games against Kansas, St. Bonaventure and Hartford. To say that Kellogg is pulling the trigger from downtown is an understatement.

"I worked real hard over the summer on three–point shots," Kellogg said. "It's a lot of team effort. When I'm open, they've been hitting me with the pass. I don't have to create my own shots, so it helps."

In the 70–53 win against Duquesne, Kellogg scored 11 points, grabbed seven rebounds and dished out six assists. He is averaging close to nine points, five assists and five rebounds. This from a point guard?

Earlier this season, Calipari stopped practice in the middle of a drill in the Curry Hicks Cage and yelled at Kellogg, telling him to take the open shot, especially when the defender plays off of him.

"If you get the ball at the top of the key and they're giving you the shot, step up to the free–throw line and take it. How do you think Anton [Brown] scored 30 [points] some nights? You can, too," Calipari said.

The entire squad laughed at the thought, and so did Kellogg.

"I think he knows what's best for the team. We have one of the best offensive rebounding teams in the country," said Kellogg. "Regardless of whether I make the shot or not, it's a no–lose situation. If I make it, it makes me look good. If the guys get the rebound and score, it also makes me look good.

"Realistically, scoring 30 is out of the picture unless some teams decide not to play me."

The ball is being passed around the key. Over to Dana Dingle. Inside to Lou Roe — he's doubled up. Back to Dingle on the wing, out to Derek Kellogg — wide open, top of the key, for three.

That shot is good 50 percent of the time.

Seen here at the Louis Brown Athletic Center in the win over Rutgers, Massachusetts point guard Derek Kellogg calls for a down–screen while the Scarlet Knight's mighty–mite Pete Marcotte defends.

Besides dishing out the assists, the junior co–captain has been knocking down the three–point field goals as well as fighting inside for rebounds.

Perfect blend gets UMass off to fast start

Never before has a UMass basketball team exploded the way this Minuteman squad has. Three games into the season the team defeated then-No.1 North Carolina on its way to the finals of the Preseason NIT, and then ripped of a 10- game winning streak before falling to Tom Kleinschmidt and DePaul on the road. As it now stands, the Minutemen are 14-2 and in the Atlantic 10's penthouse once again.

How did they do this? Why did they do this? Who did this for them? The Collegian will attempt to answer those questions in this edition of In The Paint. Here is our UMass midseason report:

IN THE PAINT
Jeff Crafts on Minuteman Basketball

FRONTCOURT: Coming into the season it was known that junior power forward Lou Roe was going to have to step to the forefront and provide leadership, consistency and firepower for the Minutemen if the team was to succeed. What was not known was whether or not Roe was ready to handle that challenge.

Roe answered that question early on when he ripped into national powers North Carolina and Kansas for a combined 53 points in the Preseason NIT. Now at midseason, the much-improved Roe has got to be considered the favorite for the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year award. He has played inspired and consistent basketball for the most part. The only times Roe has been stopped have been the few occasions when he got into early foul trouble. That is it.

Last season as a freshman, Dana Dingle provided UMass with some solid, no-flash, quality minutes off the bench for the majority of the season. Entering this season, the soft-spoken Dingle was often overlooked because of all the new talent on the Minuteman roster. Not anymore.

Dingle has been a vital part of the UMass squad. He does whatever is needed, from crashing the boards with reckless abandon to playing tough D to hitting the occasional jumper to scoring garbage hoops inside. Knowing his limitations has been the key for Dingle thus far and is the major reason why he has played large this season in his own quiet manner.

Coming into this season, John Calipari wanted fans to have realistic expectations for sophomore forward Donta Bright. Of course, the high expectations for Bright, a former blue chip recruit who sat out his freshman campaign to concentrate on academics, were still running rampant.

So far Bright has had sure signs of brilliance (a 13 for 15, 28 point game against Oklahoma) mixed in with sure signs of rust (numerous travelling violations, early foul trouble). It is fairly obvious how much talent Bright has when he harasses opponents as the point man on the UMass press, or when he skies high inside to a.) snag a rebound b.) swat an opponent's shot away or c.) score the devious. It is just a matter of time before Bright gains consistency as his rust wears off.

Despite missing five games with a knee injury suffered against Carolina, freshman center Marcus Camby looks to be the definitive Newcomer of the Year in the Atlantic 10. Camby, a seven-footer with the quickness of someone a foot shorter, is quite simply a shot-blocking machine with other all-around talents to boot.

Three plays Camby has made this year stand above the rest. First, after getting a steal at midcourt, Camby shielded off an opponent and went under the hoop for a reverse layup. Remember, this guy is seven feet tall. Number two, Camby pins an opponent's shot to the glass without even leaving his feet. Amazing. And number three, the big guy finishes off a fast break with a touch pass to Roe for a dunk. The only thing Camby needs to work on is his stamina and strength. It seems as though Camby does most of his scoring in the first half; he has got to get more shots in the second half - it is that simple. The sky's the limit for Camby, however; there is no doubt about that.

Junior center Jeff Meyer has helped out when the tempo of the game is suited to his abilities. Sophomore walk-on Rigoberto Nunez has added solid, no-frills depth to the frontcourt when given some time by Calipari.

BACKCOURT: One is solid and steady while the other is explosive and erratic. That is the story of the Minuteman starting backcourt of Derek Kellogg and Mike Williams.

Kellogg, the starting point guard, has stepped up this season and provided the Minutemen with what the team needs from its point guard: outside shooting and hard-nosed defense.

The UMass system of basketball does not rely on its

Open Letter to UMass Student Community from the Director of UHS Eye Care Program

Dear Students:

A recent survey indicates that a high percentage of students do not know they can receive Eye Care at the UHS. The purpose of this letter is to invite you to use the UHS Eye Care Program.

My name is Frederick Bloom. I graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1971 and The New England College of Optometry in 1975. Since 1975 I have been affiliated with the UHS Eye Care Program. I am very proud of the program and the high quality eye care delivered to the over 70,000 individuals at the UHS Eye Care Program over the last 18 years.

I have been on the teaching faculty of The New England College of Optometry where I have lectured to practicing optometrists and supervised fourth-year student/clinicians. Recently I co-authored an article with Dr. Abel, a UHS physician, that was published in a national optometry journal. I am also credentialed in diagnostic ocular pharmaceuticals by the Massachusetts Board of Optometry. I have significant experience in all aspects of contact lens fitting and care.

Additionally, we have a well-trained, professional and caring staff with experience in contact lens care and sports vision.

The eye services offered at the UHS include the following:

1. Complete Optometry Examinations that include a health history review, visual acuity testing, refraction ie. eye glass determination, a glaucoma check, cataract screening, contact lens check for those wearing contact lenses and a retina check with pupil dilation, if necessary.
2. Reduced Rates on Spectacle Frames and Lenses from local participating opticians with a complete optometry examination at the UHS.
3. Emergency Eye Care includes the evaluation of eye disease and disorder; these may include, but are not limited to, the following: ocular foreign bodies, conjunctivitis, lid lesions, chemical eye injuries, corneal problems, inflammation of the iris, retinal problems and evaluation of ocular trauma.
4. A Comprehensive Contact Lens service including initial evaluation, fitting if necessary, follow-up care, and same day service on many contact lenses due to our large in-house inventory; all fittings are done by eye doctors experienced in contact fitting and care. We take great pride in being able to fit many people who have had trouble in the past using contact lenses.

Patient feedback of those who have used the UHS Eye Care Program over the years has been consistently excellent.

Again, I invite you to use the UHS Eye Care Program, conveniently located on campus. If you have any questions about our service, or want to make an appointment, please call 549-2671 x244. I look forward to seeing you.

Sincerely,

Frederick H. Bloom

Busy schedule makes women battle-ready

By Andrew Bryce
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

Eventful.

One word to describe the schedule of the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team over the break — in itself, a devious word considering that the Minutewomen were not able to take one during the holiday season.

A blowout, a surprising effort, a Minutewomen first, a disappointer and a three-game winning streak were the ingredients to an overall successful seven-game stretch.

A couple of things to notice upon the conclusion of the break:

Note the strength of the opposition, playing against two teams in the Top 10 as well as a Vermont team that coasted to a 28-1 record during the 1992-93 season.

Freshman power forward Crystal Carroll of the Minutewoman basketball team fights her way inside the paint for a loose ball

Note the play of Octavia Thomas, who was awarded the Atlantic 10 Player of the Week for the week of Jan. 16.

Note the Minutewomen's outstanding foul shooting after 10 games as they were eighth in the country in free throw shooting (75 percent) prior to the Brown game.

Note the emergence of sharpshooting freshman Beth Kuzmeski, who bumped her average to over 10.0 points per game, and Nicole Carter, a 5-foot-5-inch sophomore walk-on who has started for the Minutewomen the last three games, which included a eight-rebound effort against Brown.

Note that the Minutewomen went 3-2 during the break, and improved their record to 7-4.

Here is a recap of the last seven games:

St. Peter's Tournament
MASSACHUSETTS 84, LIBERTY 59

The Minutewomen, led by Octavia Thomas (11 rebounds) and freshman Crystal Carroll, who each scored 14 points, trounced Liberty to advance to the St. Peter's Tournament championship game.

Melissa Gurile also contributed with 12 points and nine boards. Twelve players played, and 11 of them scored for the 25-point destruction, including senior Francie Hansen, who had seven points.

The Minutewomen defense also put out the Flames offense, as they held Liberty to 25 percent from the field, including 17 percent in the second half.

TEXAS TECH 50, MASSACHUSETTS 42

"The truth of the matter is we probably should've beaten Texas Tech," said Coach Joanie O'Brien.

The Minutewomen almost pulled off a major upset as they had the lead with seven minutes to go in the game against the eighth-ranked team in the country, yet scored just four points the rest of the way. Despite the last several minutes of the game, the Minutewomen managed to outscore the Red Raiders 24-22.

The Minutewomen were led by Gurile (11 points, 7 rebounds), Thomas (10 points, 7 boards) and Kuzmeski (11 rebounds). Connie Robinson led the Red Raider effort with 25 points.

VANDERBILT 77, MASSACHUSETTS 50

After playing against the likes of Texas Tech, it had to get easier. It did. Sort of.

The Minutewomen took on the Commodores, who were ranked one slot below Tech in the national rankings at eight, and were soundly defeated by 27. The game marked the first ever for the Minutewomen in the William D. Mullins Center, and 1,850 attended.

Thomas and Gurile, despite combining for 9-38 from the field, managed to score 18 points and 14 points respectively. Gurile, going up against the likes of 6-foot-10-inch Heidi Gillingham, also pulled down 11 boards.

Julie Powell led the Commodores with 15 points as five Commodore players were in double figures. Gurile's matchup against Gillingham was a successful one as she held the All-American to seven points below her average (11 points and 11 boards).

SIENA 84, MASSACHUSETTS 67

After losing to a national power in Vanderbilt, the Minutewomen did an understandable thing. They just took Siena too lightly.

The Minutewomen, up 35-34 at the half, squandered their one-point lead, only to lose by 17 in Loudonville, N.Y., on Jan. 6. Liz Lops not only won the Unofficial Name-of-the- Year contest but also led the Saints with 27 points.

Thomas was the big gun once again for the Minutewomen as she poured in 26 points and grabbed 11 boards. Gurile added 18 points and nine rebounds.

The Minutewomen turned the ball over 29 times, 11 more than the previous game against Vanderbilt.

MASSACHUSETTS 46, VERMONT 41

The Minutewomen played in the Mullins Center for the second straight weekend. This time, they had a reason to enjoy it.

After a 23-23 tie at the half, the Minutewomen defeated the Catamounts in a low-scoring outcome as they won their first-ever home game outside the Cage. Why the low score? UMass shot 35 percent (17-48) for the game, while forcing Vermont to shoot from the outside as the Catamounts wound up at 29 percent (13-46). Ugly.

But a victory no less. Once again, the leading scorer was Thomas as she poured in 19 points on 8-12 shooting. Gurile also scored 12 points and garnered 7 rebounds.

MASSACHUSETTS 81, ST. BONAVENTURE 80

What was the main task given to freshman Beth Kuzmeski before the season began? To shoot the rock.

The Bonnies learned Kuzmeski's potential the painful way as the 5-foot-7-inch guard exploded for 25 points, including five three pointers (5-9). Kuzmeski also chipped in with five rebounds, three assists, and three steals. Thomas scored 16 points, Carroll had 15 points and Gurile chipped in with 13 and grabbed 10 rebounds.

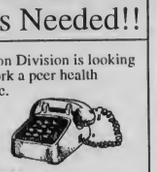
The Minutewomen shot 54 percent from the field and held the Lady Bonnies to just 38 percent.

MASSACHUSETTS 58, BROWN 43

Back in the Cage for the first time since Dec. 8, the Minutewomen were led by Kuzmeski for the second consecutive game as she buried three of four three-pointers on her way to 19 points.

Down 21-18 late in the first half, the Minutewomen went on a 20-0 run that carried on to second half to take a 38-21 lead. UMass then survived a Brown 8-0 run of their own before defeating the Bears by 13 points.

Michelle Pagliaro was the lone double-digit scorer for Brown with 17 points.



Along with Kuzmeski, the Minutewomen were led by Thomas' 10 points, Nicole Carter's eight rebounds, Gurile (9 points, 7 boards), and Carroll's seven points and seven rebounds.

Suffice it to say, a strong team effort.

New Mullins milestone — women's hoop

By Sean P. Hayden
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

Jan. 2, 1994 — a day when most people are still trying to get used to a new number at the end of the date — saw the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team trying to get used to its new home, the William D. Mullins Center.

The outcome of the game — the Minutewomen suffered a 77–50 loss at the hands of Vanderbilt — was not as important as what the game signified for the program.

Just four years ago, the thought of playing a team like Vandy, which is fresh off a Final Four appearance and toted a No. 7 national ranking into the game, at home in a 10,000 seat arena seemed about as possible as having clear streets in downtown Amherst in mid–January.

Since her arrival three years ago, Massachusetts Coach Joanie O'Brien has emphasized that she wants the program to be known on the national level. As much as the team and O'Brien herself enjoy playing in the cozy Curry Hicks Cage, she knows that this can only be accomplished with the Minutewomen playing against the Vanderbilts, the Ohio States and the Texas Techs of the world in front of a packed house in a first–class facility like the Mullins Center.

"For us to get to the national level, which is where we want to be," O'Brien said, "we have to play in the Mullins Center and we have to get people in here to watch us play.

"Our goal is to have all our home games in Mullins."

Massachusetts brought the crowd in for the Vanderbilt game — the Minutewomen played in front of a school record 1,850 people — a fact that was not lost on O'Brien.

"If it starts at 1,800, let's make that the starting point and build from there," O'Brien said. She added, however, "If you get those 1,800 people in the Cage, that place would be rocking."

The second Mullins game, a 45–41 Jan. 9 win over Vermont, generated a crowd of 1,011, which was pretty decent considering Massachusetts had lost its last three games heading in. The Minutewomen are scheduled for two more dates at Mullins this year — a Jan. 22 contest versus West Virginia (not yet played at press time) and a Feb. 12 matchup against Rutgers.

According to those affected the most by the change of address — the players — Mullins is still as foreign to them as it is to their opponents, and will take some time to get accustomed to their new digs.

"Right now I like the Cage better," said sophomore center Melissa Gurile after the Vanderbilt game. "It's smaller and louder. If you put that crowd in the Cage, that place would've been crazy. This place seemed empty."

"I didn't like it. It's cold and the lights bothered me when I tried to shoot," said sophomore forward Octavia Thomas, who suffered through a 4–18 day from the field against the Lady Commodores.

"The Cage is louder and it's much easier to call out plays there because you can hear better," freshman guard Beth Kuzmeski said.

The future, which the Minutewomen claim they are working for, looked much brighter for Mullins following the Vermont game at least in the eyes of one player.

Thomas was asked why she shot so well (8–12) while the rest of the team struggled (9–40), the sophomore smiled and said, "Must be the building."

Must be.

Maleeka Valentine and the rest of the Minutewomen traded in the coziness of the Cage for the parquet of the William D. Mullins Center for three contests over winter session

Freshman makes an immediate impact

By Sean P. Hayden
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

The University of Massachusetts basketball program has had its share of headline–grabbing freshmen the past few years.

Roe. Thomas. Camby. Gurile. There is one more precocious youngster whose name is about to be added to the list. Her name is Beth Kuzmeski.

Kuzmeski, a 5–foot–7–inch guard for Coach Joanie O'Brien's Minutewomen, has impressed many early and often with her steady and sometimes spectacular performances.

Performances like the one she had 11 days ago at St. Bonaventure. Kuzmeski scored a career–high 25 points thanks to a 9 for 14 shooting day, including 5–of–9 from behind the three–point line, to help lead Massachusetts to a 81–68 Atlantic 10 win over the Bonnies.

Or the game she had against Brown Jan. 19 when she shot 7–10 from the floor (3–4 3–point FG) and led the team with 19 points while collecting four assists, three rebounds and two steals.

It was Kuzmeski's shooting ability, in fact, that first raised the eyebrows of O'Brien three years ago when she first accepted the responsibility of turning the Minutewoman program around.

"We needed a shooter," O'Brien said. "You knew then that she had something special. I watched her and I don't think she got the credit she deserved. She's a big–time shooter."

Calling someone a shooter sometimes implies a certain selfishness, but this big–time shooter isn't someone who's stationed behind the arc, waiting to let it fly.

"I shoot the ball pretty well," said Kuzmeski, who's averaging nearly four assists per game to go along with her 11 points and five rebounds. "But I always look for the open man before I shoot."

"She's got a little bit of a point guard mentality," O'Brien said. "She doesn't just jack it up there. She shoots it when she needs to and she also gives the ball to people at the right time."

The Northampton native received offers to play from several Division I teams, but opted to play in her own backyard because, as she says, "It's local and the program is on the rise."

"Initially she had thought maybe she wanted to go away from home," O'Brien said. "But we hung in there with her and recruited her and things worked out and she chose to come here and I think right now she's doing more than I even thought she could do."

Kuzmeski began the season as a starter, but O'Brien has called upon Kuzmeski to come off the bench the last few games in an attempt to generate some offense from her second unit.

"Here comes Beth very fresh, ready–to–go while the other team may be just a little bit more tired," O'Brien said. "And sometimes you can sneak somebody in and they don't pay attention to who's coming in and now she's going to get a couple of open shots before they realize it's her. When she comes into the game, she gives us a huge lift."

Besides her marksman shooting eye and passing ability, Kuzmeski brought something else with her to the team, according to her coaches — an attitude.

"She's a competitor, she doesn't like to lose," O'Brien said. "To be a good player at this level, you have to have a little bit of arrogance, you have to.

"Whether it's right or wrong doesn't really matter. I think she feels good about where she is. She's just got that special air about her that a lot of good players have."

"When you're a point guard, you have to be confident because everyone else has to look to you as a leader," said Assistant Coach Chantel Tremitiere, who should know. Tremitiere led the Auburn Lady Tigers to three Final Four appearances during her playing days. "If you're not confident then no one will respect you."

Just like any fickle freshman, Kuzmeski has had those games that will make a coach pull her hair out, like an

Skaters win big at home, make progress

By Michael Morrissey
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

While most people dread the cold and ice during the December break, the University of Massachusetts hockey team seemed to flourish on it.

Despite losing captain Jaynen Rissling and Tom Perry to injuries at the end of winter session, the team won four of six games while carrying a winter class as well. Suffice it to say the Minutemen learned a few valuable lessons during their December "break."

"Our team, with the exception of myself and Brett Pearlstein, took an arts and theater class in addition to playing hockey every day," Rissling said. "I took a French class and Brett took a law class.

"Indeed, the break gave us a lot of time to practice and plan for game preparation and to heal physically. I feel we've come along during the month."

Massachusetts 7, Gustavus Adolphus 2

Dec. 30 — Coming off the post-semester layoff and finals week, the Minutemen, led by Warren Norris' two goals, easily defeated the Golden Gusties (2-6-1) at the Mullins Center. UMass scored two goals within 26 seconds in the opening period and outshot Gustavus Adolphus 43-21. Dave Kilduff recorded the win and the team looked primed for Division I foe Princeton.

Princeton 8, Massachusetts 1

Jan. 2 — "When we went in we thought we could handle them because of [UMass' close loss at] St. Lawrence," Rissling said. "They had just come from a tournament and had played overseas in Europe, including a few professional teams, and obviously showed us what Division I hockey is about."

Defenseman Jon Agganis of the Massachusetts hockey team levels an opponent with a check into the boards

The Tigers jumped ahead on their home ice with four goals in the first period and skated all over the Minutemen. Kilduff and Rich Moriarty split time in net. Tom Perry scored the team's only goal on a power play in the second period.

Massachusetts 7, Colby 4

Jan. 7 — After losing their first game to a Division III opponent at the hands of the White Mules in Waterville, Maine, back in December, UMass was waiting for this William D. Mullins Center rematch for over a month. Back on their heels to start the game, the Minuteman defense allowed a goal by Colby's Brian Cronin just nine seconds into the first period.

However, UMass raised its record to 11-4 thanks to Rob Bonneau's first collegiate hat trick and Mike Evans' two tallies.

"Coach [Mallen] stressed the importance of beating Colby and Salem State in the same weekend," said Perry two nights later. "We wanted to get them in our barn ever since they beat us. Revenge was definitely on our minds."

Massachusetts 8, Salem State 3

Jan. 9 — The Minutemen trailed 2-1 after the first period despite the play of goalie Rich Moriarty, who was unhappy at getting passed over for the start against Colby, according to Mallen.

"Rich was upset that he didn't start Friday night, but I told him to keep working hard and his time would come," said Mallen. "I thought Rich played really well. He made some clutch saves and was the difference between us winning and losing tonight."

Mallen challenged his lackluster squad ("I told them they could either start skating now or we'd skate all week") at the first intermission, and two two-sport athletes stepped up big. Steve Corradi, a former shortstop on the baseball team, nailed a slapshot in the upper right corner at 17:21 of the second period to give UMass a 4-3 lead they would hold onto, and football defensive end Brian Corcoran scored his first points since joining the squad on two assists.

"They have some Division I transfers and we knew going in it would be a tough battle," said Norris. "The game was a physical one and we hit when we had to."

Connecticut College 5, Massachusetts 4 (OT)

Jan. 14 — Chalk this loss up to inexperience, a hostile crowd, having to play without the injured Rissling, who was hit in practice and suffered a second degree sprain of his anterior cruciate ligament, or all of the above. Whichever way you slice it, the Minutemen could have beaten the Camels (4-5). UMass lost its third consecutive road game.

Bonneau and Blair Manning scored in the first period to steal a 1-0 lead away from Connecticut College, but the Camels went ahead 4-3 late in the game before Armand Latulippe tied things up with 1:30 left in regulation. Skip Miller beat Kilduff 1:07 into the extra period.

"We're young, which means we'll lose some games we're supposed to win and win some which we're supposed to lose," Rissling said. "A lot of guys don't realize that it's still an uphill battle and we can still be a losing team if we lose the rest of our games. We don't want to happen because our goal is to have a winning team."

Massachusetts 8, Trinity College 2

Jan. 18 — The Minutemen improved to 5-0 after a loss and won on the road in Hartford, Conn. Dennis Wright had four goals, including three in a span of 3:10 as UMass blasted Trinity. Manning, Latulippe, Corradi, Bonneau and Blair Wagar, Moriarty recorded the win over the Bantams (3-7) with 20 saves.

The great trip to the frozen tundra of Alaska...

The Minutemen played the Nanooks of Alaska-Fairbanks but, unfortunately, results were not available before the Collegian went to press. Mallen had made the 9,000-mile trip six times previously and said the two-game, back-to- back contests against the Division I Nanooks (14-8-1) will be a great experience for his team.

Unfortunately, UMass was undermanned as Rissling and Perry did not make the trip and Evans, the third leading scorer, was also hurt.

Wright returned for only the second time since moving from Alaska to Michigan at age 14 and said he was looking forward to the trip.

Dna-timers: UMass returns to the home ice of the Mullins Center on Jan. 25 against American International College. The team has four remaining home games in the spring semester.

Bonneau leads the team with 26 points (as of Jan. 20) on 17 goals. Wright is second on the team with 23 points.

The team has three more Division I opponents this season: Army, Merrimack and R.I.T.

Corcoran sheds cleats, laces up hockey skates

By Michael Morrissey
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

Brian Corcoran, defensive end for the University of Massachusetts football team, had to find out for sure whether or not he could still skate with the best of them.

He had the urge during the Minutemen's successful 8-3 campaign in which he led the team in sacks and finished fourth in tackles, but he held it back. When he was a football player, he played football.

But after the awards were announced and Corcoran won All-Yankee Conference, All-ECAC and All-New England, the junior finally went with helmet in hand to hockey coach Joe Mallen.

"When I heard the program came in, I went up and talked to him," Corcoran said. "I said, 'Listen, I played a lot of hockey when I was younger. After football, could you give me a tryout?'"

"At the end of the football season I said, 'Oh, maybe I shouldn't have, maybe I shouldn't have,' but I have to stick to my word," admitted Mallen. "Finally, things happen, I give him the chance and who knows, he could be a regular for us."

Corcoran realizes that his roles on the two teams are different. As a pass rusher on the football team, Corcoran is without peer. He is looked to as the type of player who can turn the game around with one play.

On the ice, Corcoran is inexperienced, to say the least. He hasn't played competitively since 1990 and admits he was only mildly recruited for hockey.

"I'm not a leader by any means," he said. "I'm probably the least skilled player on the team. These guys are all great players, and they've been real helpful in keeping me going, even when I was falling down at center ice."

The defensive end-turned-defenseman made his debut at the Mullins Center on Jan. 7 against Colby, finally cracking the starting lineup after weeks of practice.

Corcoran's decision prompted more decisions in his family. The UMass football postseason banquet occurred on the same night as one of the UMass hockey games, so Mr. and Mrs. Corcoran went to the banquet, without Brian, while his sister saw him in the starting lineup on the ice.

"It's just a tribute to him as an athlete to be able to come in and contribute to the hockey team," football defensive coordinator Bill McGovern said. "I know his football teammates are behind him all the way."

In only his second start, Corcoran notched two assists, one to Armand Latulippe and the other to Tom Perry, in the team's 6-3 win against Salem State.

"One of the recruiting angles I will use with [Corcoran and fellow two-sport athlete Steve Corradi] is that I didn't know them from Adam but I gave them the chance and they've made the team," Mallen said. "Brian Corcoran has some innate athletic ability.

"He goes back and gets the puck just like he's rushing the offensive line. There are some things that he puts together between his eyes and his brain that makes him an athlete."

Members of the football team sit on the other side of the glass of the Mullins Center, cheering Corcoran on and waiting for an unsuspecting opponent to dig a puck out of the corner. There's no jealousy, just an urge to see their 250-pound teammate pound rink rats into the boards.

"People say he could get injured playing hockey. Geez, you can get injured walking around the way the roads are here," said Head Football Coach Mike Hodges. "My feeling is the same as if a kid wants to go out for track or baseball. I'm happy for Brian and I can't wait to see him play."

"All my life I've been caught halfway between one or the other, and I just decided on football when the time came," Corcoran said. "But this is a great opportunity, it's like a dream come true."

Hixon to leave UMass

Coach to take over reins of U.S. team

By Matt Vautour
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

When the United States Field Hockey Team takes the field at the 1996 Summer Olympics in Atlanta, it will be University of Massachusetts Coach Pam Hixon leading the squad into battle.

Hixon will take a two-year leave of absence from UMass to concentrate on the national program. In addition to the Olympics, she will be taking the team to the Pan American Games and the World Cup in Dublin, Ireland. She will also be in charge of strengthening the youth programming and establishing a national coaching staff.

"The position is similar to college and recruiting, but on a much larger scale," said Hixon.

"It was a difficult decision," said Hixon. "UMass field hockey is on the rise, and I've enjoyed our teams and our success, but coaching a team with this much talent is a challenging, fascinating thought."

The chance to represent her country again was also a factor in her decision.

"Representing the United States in international competition is difficult to describe unless you're a part of it," said Hixon, who was a member of the U.S. National Team as a player from 1969-79. "Hearing the national anthem is overwhelming. It's an incredible experience."

The resume that Hixon brings to the position is impressive. She was named the 1981 Collegiate Coach of the Year in only her fourth season, and has captured the Atlantic 10 and Northeast Regional Coach of the Year Awards several times. Her 254 career victories is the most among active Division I coaches, and second only to Rhonda Ridinger's 269 on the all-time list, a mark she will surely pass when she returns to collegiate coaching.

Hixon inherits a program that is looking for respect. After earning a bronze medal at the 1984 Olympics, the United States finished last in 1988 and failed to qualify for Olympic play in 1992. In 1996, the Americans will be guaranteed an Olympic berth because they are the host country, but just participating is not enough for Hixon.

"Improving our position in the world is one of my goals," said Hixon. "We want to do more than just show up. It's going to take a lot of hard work. We will give ourselves every opportunity to compete for our dreams."

On the home front, Hixon's players have been supportive of their coach.

A new era of UMass women's gym begins

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

To say that Massachusetts Women's Gymnastics Coach David Kuzara wants his team to aim high is an understatement.

Kuzara, entering his first season at the helm of the Minutewomen, replaced former UMass Coach Alfie Mitchell, who departed Amherst for the same post at the University of California–Berkeley, last September.

"When you start any season, you have to have something that you're shooting for," Kuzara said. "And we feel like this team, it's kind of a long shot, can get to the national championships as a team. Realistically, I think we'll be a Top 20 team by the end of the year."

Rene Lyst, a former gymnast for Penn State and current assistant coach under Kuzara, said a goal is for the squad to perform consistently from meet to meet.

"As far as things we can control, we want to be consistent," said Lyst, who graduated from Penn State last year and competed against UMass last season.

Massachusetts lost three seniors from the 1993 squad: Tammy Marshall, the NCAA champion on the floor exercise, Abby May and Lisa-Beth Cronen. However, Kuzara said he is very happy with his team's prospects, citing six possible all-arounders who can all do well in any given meet.

That group is made up of seniors Margaret Furtado and Angela Jent, sophomores Shaheda Keels and Ruth Reeves, and freshmen Lianne Liang and Tara Swartz, who have already made an impact for the Minutewomen.

In the team's first meet, Swartz was the highest all-arounder for UMass, scoring a 37.350 which earned her a third-place finish. Liang also impressed Kuzara, finishing third on the vault with a 9.525.

"I think we're a little deeper team this year and it's going to give everybody an opportunity at the all-around," Kuzara said. "It'll also help us keep people healthy and sharp throughout the year."

Kuzara said that the Minutewomen are strong in three out of the four events, with bars being the weakest so far this season, citing lack of difficulty in the routines as one of the reasons.

"For us, bars is probably an event we need to work on a little bit more than the others. It's not necessarily a weak event, but we don't have the difficulty level with the system," he said.

Every four years, the NCAA changes some of its rules and Kuzara said that this season the scoring has tightened, making it harder to achieve high scores, especially 10s.

"The new system of judging has made getting high scores a little more difficult, so you won't see as many 10s, certainly, as you have in previous years."

One drawback for this season, according to both Kuzara and Lyst, is that the Minutewomen have only three home meets, with the first coming Feb. 4 against MIT and the highlight one month later against rival New Hampshire.

A meet Kuzara points to as one of the most entertaining of the season — Feb. 11 at the University of Arizona. The two other opponents? Ohio State, according to both Kuzara and Lyst, is that the Minutewomen have only Kuzara and Mitchell's Cal-Berkeley team.

"We'll see Alfie in Arizona. I know that his team's going to be fired up and we want to show him how good we are," said Kuzara.

Men back in the swim

Undefeated Minutemen look ahead

By Sean P. Hayden
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

Despite the loss of five of its top 10 swimmers, the University of Massachusetts men's swimming team upped its record to 9–0 over the winter session (Jan. 22 home meet against Connecticut had not taken place at press time) with victories against Brown and Dartmouth and a first place finish at the Rhode Island Invitational.

According to Coach Russ Yarworth, senior sprinter Aaron Osborne quit before the season, and freshman backstrokers Jonah Osborne and Gary Spremullo are both out — Osborne because of a dislocated kneecap and Spremullo for disciplinary reasons. Also, sophomore Chris Antonetti, who swims the butterfly, isn't returning to school because of academic and financial reasons.

Yarworth's biggest loss may have come in the form of sophomore freestyler Jose Santa, who was recently hospitalized for what Yarworth believes to be a diabetic condition.

"We're kind of scrambling a little bit," Yarworth said. "We've got some weaknesses in some events, but the guys that are here and in there training have gone 9–0.

"The kids I've got are training as well as any team I've ever had," he said. "They're very dedicated and hard workers and even when I yell at them and scream at them, they come back looking for more."

The Minutemen erupted at the Rhode Island Invitational, easily outdistancing second place finisher Providence by 157 points (475–318). Santa led the way, finishing first in both the 100 and 200-yard freestyle and the 100-yard butterfly.

"I threw a challenge at the guys because I trained them as hard as I've ever trained

Women prepare for ECAC meet

By Michael Reiss
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

It's close to Taper Time for the University of Massachusetts women's swimming team. And after a long, hard-working intersession, it can be excused that the team is counting the days very closely.

Tapering for a swimmer means resting after a long and arduous schedule, and the Minutewomen are winding down after strenuous work.

On Dec. 27, the squad flew out of Bradley Airport to Fort Lauderdale, Fla., for the start of a grueling eight-day trip.

"It was probably one of the best training trips we've ever had," said Coach Bob Newcomb. "It gave us a great opportunity. They were very sore and tired, and yet they still kept a great attitude."

The team has been working hard, focusing on the upcoming Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference championships. The ECACs, an event only qualified swimmers may attend, is a three-day competition which begins March 3.

The New England Championships will be a time when unqualified swimmers will have a shot to establish themselves as ECAC participants.

Over the break, UMass had one dual meet. On Jan. 11, the team suffered a 179–123 loss to Dartmouth.

UMass' Hart breaks record

By Andrew Bryce
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

The injury bug has hit.

Injuries have forced many members of the University of Massachusetts women's track team to be out of action.

From distance runner Kristen Diggs to 800 meter runner Jen Barry, from Jessie Rutherford (400M, triple jump, relay) to Stacy Barbuto (high jump, hurdles). According to Coach Julia LaFreniere and staff, the injuries have caused a substantial loss of possible points.

However, LaFreniere said she knows that a strong experienced team must fight through the setbacks to achieve their goals — especially in track, where a number of athletes strive for personal records to help the team to victory. LaFreniere has received just that from many members of the team.

On Jan. 14, UMass competed against the University of Maine and Boston College up in Orono, Maine. The Minutewomen finished with 68 points, just short of the Eagles' 74 points and ahead of the Black Bears 36-point total. The meet came down to the last event, the 4x800 relay, with BC squeaking by the Minutewomen. The team of Kerry Aker, Jen Waeger, Kim Hargrave and Kim Liljeblad finished in 9:52.30, while the Eagles finished in 9:45.91.

One standout for the Minutewomen was two-sport star Natalie Hart, who plays field hockey in the fall. Hart broke her own school record by an inch and a half in the shot put with a heave of 42-foot, 4 3/4-inch, good enough for first place. One problem: she did not compete in the Jan. 21 meet (results unavailable at press time) at Dartmouth against Maine and New Hampshire. Why? An injury.

Besides Hart, winners for the Minutewomen were Erika Doyle in the 60-yard dash (7.50) and the 400 meters (59.24), Janey Meeks in the high jump (5'3") and the triple jump (37'0"), Waeger in the 1000 yards (2:45.39), and Katie Greenia in the 3000 meters (10:27.34).

The Minutewomen will compete in Dartmouth against Vermont and New Hampshire this Saturday at noon.

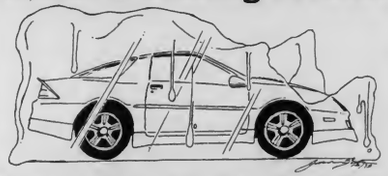
point guard for dribble penetration so that plays right up Kellogg's alley. Instead of knifing into the lane for a layup, Kellogg sits back and shoots the open jump shot when available. The big thing is that Kellogg is recognizing when he has to shoot better than last year.

Oh, what a year it has been for Mike Williams. The enigmatic Mike Williams, that is. Williams is as talented as any guard in the conference, but is as inconsistent as any guard in the A-10 as well.

Defensively, Williams can be a major stopper when he wants to be. Offensively, Williams can be a fearless, effective penetrator and clutch outside shooter when he plays in control. After a trip to Calipari's doghouse, Williams has shown signs of possibly being the player he can be.

A pair of freshmen, Edgar Padilla and Carmelo Travieso, have been the backups for UMass in the backcourt. And both, while showing definite signs of being major players, have also showed definite signs of being freshmen.



Padilla, a natural point guard, has seen the most playing time of the two. Extremely quick with strong hands, Padilla sometimes gambles too much defensively and sometimes tries to make too good a play offensively.

Travieso, meanwhile, was brought into Amherst with the reputation of a three-point bomber. However, it often appears that Travieso is passing up on shooting opportunities. That should change as his confidence grows with more playing opportunities.

OVERALL: With three starters gone, only four experienced players back and a schedule that ranks among the toughest in the nation, nobody, not even (or maybe that should be especially) Calipari, would tell you that they expected this year's Minutemen to explode out of the blocks the way UMass has.

They've done it by playing tough defense, crashing the glass like there is no tomorrow and hitting big shots down the stretches of the (few) close games that they have had. The one criticism is the team's tendency to play to its level of competition.

Calipari's liberal substitution pattern has allowed a number of players to contribute to this fast start. Let's just hope the rest of the year is as successful and exciting as the first half.

he scored 17 points and grabbed seven rebounds. Dingle was key inside, finishing many plays with tough layups underneath. The backcourt of Williams (16 points) and Kellogg (13 points) combined for 29 points while keeping the Mountaineer guards in check for the majority of the night.

Massachusetts 87, St. Bonaventure 60

Before an uncharacteristically quiet yet capacity crowd in the Mullins Center, Roe put an exclamation point on the scoring success he's having this season, tallying the 1000th point of his career. He torched the Bonnies for 27 points.

The Minutemen ran their winning streak to 10 with the victory and remained undefeated in the Atlantic 10.

De Paul 78, Massachusetts 76

The streak is over. In a week in which Top 10 teams dropped like flies, No. 6 was no exception. Tom Kleinschmidt scored 29 points as he once again killed Calipari's club, leading the Blue Demons to the upset of the Minutemen. A Williams' trey tied the contest at 73, but there would be no magic on this night. Roe missed a running three-pointer at the buzzer and Massachusetts dropped to 13-2.

Massachusetts 76, Rutgers 54

Waliyy Dixon's bank- three-pointer off the glass from halfcourt just before halftime gave the Scarlet Knights a 35-32 advantage and left the Minutemen stunned. However, Calipari lit into his team in the locker room and the players came out in the second half on fire, burying Rutgers and improving to 6-0 in the A-10, before last Saturday's game with George Washington (results were not available before deadline).

At one point early in the second half, Calipari turned to the student section in the Mullins Center and went crazy, trying to get some support for his team in their attempt to pull away from the Knights.

Camby went down in the first half, holding his right knee, the same one he injured against North Carolina earlier in the season. The building and its crowd were stone-cold silent in fear of the worst, but Camby returned later in the game, seemingly fine. He jammed one home on a baseline drive just for emphasis.

Massachusetts 56, George Washington 55

"That lucky son of a bitch," joked George Washington Coach Mike Jarvis after Calipari and the Minutemen preserved their unbeaten record at the Mullins Center by downing the Colonials on a last second jam by Camby.

The play of the game was the dish to Camby by Bright, who fought through traffice and hurled a bullet across the key which the freshman center caught and threw down for the only Minuteman lead of the game. Massachusetts remained undefeated in the A-10 at 7-0 with the victory.

After the Bearcats tomorrow, Massachusetts returns home for Rhode Island on Super Bowl Sunday and Florida State on Feb. 3 before traveling to the Meadowlands in New Jersey to face Kentucky.

"(Dartmouth) has some superb front line swimmers," Newcomb said. "In a way that was good. It served as a wake-up call that we were back into competition."

About a week later, the squad traveled to the Rhode Island Invitational, facing off against Providence, Rhode Island and Maine. A second place performance was the final result, as the team finished with 419.5 points.

Highly-touted Providence (453) topped the field.

"I was pleased we stayed that close to Providence," Newcomb said. "They had a touch more depth than we did, but we hung in there."

While Newcomb praised the overall work ethic of the squad, he felt that some swimmers performed above the call of duty.

Mid-distance swimmer Kristin Schambach, a freshman, was one to receive accolades from Newcomb.

"I think the trip was a very good first step for her as far as development," said Newcomb.

Junior Karen Hodges has also continued to improve, establishing herself as a potent distance swimming force.

"She continues to get faster every time she gets into the pool," noted Newcomb.

Consistent Sarah Baker, a sophomore sprinter, has displayed relentless effort to better herself as well.

"She's been working extremely hard and is swimming fast," said Newcomb.

Junior Kristen Chapelle, an upper-level sprinter, has also reached new heights in the pool.

"We've made some changes with her strokes," Newcomb said. "She's been producing really well for us now."

Pam Perog is another swimmer who Newcomb feels is ready to break out.

"She's been working very, very hard," he said. "You can feel she's going to start performing.

"They're continuing the kind of training we've been asking for," Newcomb said. "I think they're starting to see the proverbial light at the end of the tunnel. I'm pleased with the attitude of the team, along with the training atmosphere."

a team the week before that meet," Yarworth said. "We won four out of the five events Friday night."

The Minutemen slacked off a little Saturday morning, until a few choice and inspirational words from the coach straightened them out.

"I lit into them," Yarworth said, "and then in the afternoon session we won all but one event."

Some of Coach Joanie O'Brien's thoughts on the seven game stretch:

O'Brien on the Siena game: "[Going into Siena], we felt we were a pretty good team, yet we didn't come ready to play. We didn't play well, but I took responsibility after the loss. I let so many things go. Instead of looking at the small things, we looked at the big picture.

"As much as you hate to lose, I think it was a great wake- up call for us. Believe me, they have been reminded several times of that game since then. They are a little embarrassed. But it's better to learn the lesson early and against a non- conference team than in A-10 play."

O'Brien on the Texas Tech game: "We're still so young and inexperienced at the games like [the Texas Tech game] that I'm not sure we knew how to deal with it."

O'Brien on sophomore walk-on Nicole Carter: "Nicole has come on strong. She's probably the fastest and quickest in a short amount of time that we have on our team. She does the little things. Against Brown, she had eight rebounds, and she's 5-four 5.

O'Brien on Crystal Carroll: "The person I am most pleased with right now has been Crystal. Like Beth, she has come a long way. I put a lot of pressure on her, and she has had her up and downs. She is starting to believe in herself, especially with shooting. Crystal's a very good shooter. She's going to make a difference for us.

O'Brien on the Mullins Center: "It's a special building. It's a great place to play. Everything about it. As for us, we have to play here to get to the next level. It's not quite the same as the Cage. Instead of worrying about how it would be louder in the Cage, we just want to get more people in the Mullins Center.

"For a while, everyone was saying 'it's the Minutemen's building.' But it's not. It's a basketball building when the court is down, and when we're playing there, it is ours."

Kuzmeski

0-10 shooting day against Siena, an 84-67 Massachusetts loss.

"Siena was just one of those games," said O'Brien. "I told her, 'You may have another one in your life,' hopefully they'll never be another 0-fer."

Just like any other freshman, Kuzmeski has also had those games that make a player wonder if she is any good, like the Dec. 11 win at Providence, where the guard contributed her share to a team total 29 turnovers.

"They put a lot of pressure on the guards and I had a lot of turnovers," Kuzmeski said.

Kuzmeski may sometimes wonder, but not her coach.

"I think she can be really, really good," Tremitiere said. "Beth can be as good as she wants to be. She's the only one who's going to hold her back.

"The thing about Beth is that she gets better every day."

And she's got a lot of days left.

Hixon

"We're obviously going to miss her," said goalie Stacy Walker, "but there is no more qualified person for the job. It'll be a tough adjustment, but I think we'll pull through okay."

"The players have been wonderful," said Hixon. "They were initially emotional and somewhat disappointed that I wouldn't be here, but they felt it was a great opportunity for me and the program."

There are no leading contenders for the Interim head coach, but Hixon confirmed that it will be someone outside UMass that will fill in during her national tenure. Assistant coaches Amy Robertson and Ainslee Press will likely return.

"Any interim coach will have to be qualified, competent and able to keep the team at the level that it is at," said Hixon.

The reaction from potential recruits has been mixed, but Hixon claims there will be no way to know for sure how much her decision has affected recruiting until the Feb. 2 signing date.

Hixon may not be the only one representing UMass at the 1996 games. Senior forwards Jenn Salisbury and Tara Jelley and freshman midfielder Kyle Rothenberger are all expected to try out for the U.S. squad. Goaltender Hilary Rose is expected to earn a spot on the Great Britain team and will likely compete against her collegiate coach.

Hixon insists that she will return to UMass following the Olympics to renew her quest for a national championship.

The business of Art

By CHRISTINA ORWICZ
◆ Collegian Staff ◆

In her book Art Without Rejection, Sheila Reid explores many different and vital questions of art: the source, creation, rejection and life of it. Mostly, however, she deals with the issue of the business of art, attempting to give aspiring and current artists a different perspective on the world of art, how to be successful in it and how to take charge of their portion of it – without rejection.

Starting with an inclusive and explanatory introduction, Reid says "Art is meant to stir the instinctive and intellectual depths in people. It's a mainline to the treasures of the unconscious mind."

She goes on to explain that having to sell one's art, and have it accepted by society changes this, particularly because rejection interferes with this creative process.

Reid states in the introduction that she would like to debase the idea that artists must deal with rejection, that it is part of being in the field.

"Constant rejection can destroy an artist's deepest, most poignant inspirations," she said. In fact, Reid goes on to explain that artists who put themselves through constant rejection become personally damaging to their work.

"I don't believe that accepting rejection is an intelligent alternative for artists. That is why I agreed to write this book."

Further on, Reid discusses her experiences with her own work, particularly with her showing of it in both Europe and the United States. While explaining the ins and outs of how the system of galleries, dealers, exhibits and museums works, Reid relates how she began showing, without rejection. Essentially, she feels artists' right of choice is exerted when they choose not to have their work rejected.

Reid explains that her book is not to be treated as a "how- to" book, telling that she read many books like that, written by both artists and non-artists. Being unsatisfied after doing research this way, she decided to come up with her own plan. She warns her readers that hers is only one perspective and not a guide to success.

One of the main strengths of Reid's book is that she puts recent trends in the art world in historical context, speaking of the differing views and roles of galleries, dealers and artists

A sample of reggae-like, oceanic jams

The Samples
The Samples
W.A.R.?, Ltd.

The refrains of "Feel Us Shaking" couldn't be a more fitting opening for The Samples' recording career. The oceanic dreamscape created by the Boulder, Colo., songmasters exemplifies their seemingly inherent ability to simultaneously invigorate and soothe their listeners.

Many thanks are in order for the folks at What Are Records? (W.A.R.?) who decided to re-release The Samples, the band's self-titled debut, to accompany last fall's pressing of The Last Drag, the band's latest and best work to date. To snag one of these gems without the other would be like smearing ketchup on your meatburger while skipping the bun entirely.

Make no mistake, Sean Kelly is a vocal angel. While his consistently high-end vocals occasionally get whiny, he generally maintains a gorgeously airy and smooth style; sounding like Sting with much less bite but a much keener ear for pleasing atmospherics. Kelly's moans of "nothing was learned" on the pacifistic "Ocean of War," are emphatically magnetic.

The Samples was a tiptoeing, light-stepping introduction which often ventured into heavily reggae-influenced rhythms while delivering tune after tune of harmonic whitebread soul. "Feel Us Shaking" was just the beautiful start. With ocean metaphors, an eager romantic mood is set.

A moody gem called "Waited Up" paradoxically follows "Feel Us Shaking." Despite the lyrics' descrip-

Skavoovee tour promotes unique tunes

By BRIAN BABINEAU
◆ Collegian Staff ◆

COURTESY MOON RECORDS

Local ska masters, the Toasters.

This past fall, a huge tour crossed most of North America, and its lineup consisted of some of the most famous bands who play a particular type of music.

No, it wasn't Lollapalloza or Monsters of Rock, but Skavoovee, a tour consisting of some of the most famous ska bands from both past and present.

The lineup included Jamaica's Skatalites, Britain's Selecter and Special Beat, and America's own Toasters, who played a rowdy show here at UMass last semester. The lineup was flushed by local acts at every city, like Boston faves Bim Skala Bim and Los Angeles' Untouchables.

The tour sold out many of the clubs they played, including the kickoff concert at Boston's own Avalon, and proved that ska is a unique and popular style of music whose influences are wide ranging, even though it is a style of music that has been around for years.

In the early 1960s, islands in the West Indies got a hold of American rhythm and blues and developed their own conceptions of R&B and soul. They created ska which, when slowed down and mellowed, became ska's close and somewhat more popular relative, reggae.

However, soon many Caribbean musicians immigrated to Britain to join the country's burgeoning

Goodbye, Piggly Wiggly!

Student salutes southern experience

By Caleb Cochran ◆ Collegian Staff

Greetings and welcome back! For most of you, winter break was a brief vacation from UMass which lasted about five weeks. For me, however, it marked the final stretch in an eight-month absence from the Happy Valley.

As a participant in the National Student Exchange Program, I spent the fall semester at the University of South Carolina in Columbia, S.C. Here, then, is a brief synopsis of my trip: What I'll miss about USC, what I won't, and why I'm glad to be back. This should be fun.

One thing I certainly will not miss about South Carolina are BUGS. They're everywhere. I can tolerate a few outdoor pests, but when they get in my room, that's another story.

As my roommate so eloquently put it, "Roaches are not cool." I couldn't agree more. There are few things in this world more repulsive than a family of cockroaches using your underwear drawer for their home. Trust me. I've been there.

Another thing I won't miss about USC is the prehistoric mentality regarding housing arrangements. When I arrived on campus, I was surprised to learn that no women resided on my floor. I found out later, however, that mine was one of the few co-ed buildings on campus. Forget co-ed floors – that would be out of the question.

The guest policy was just as absurd. I don't even remember the intricate details, but I seem to recall that you have to leave about eight forms of ID at the desk if you want to go up and see your girlfriend. All this hassle, but they leave the doors to the dorms unlocked 24 hours a day. And they wonder why we Yankees won the war.

On a more positive note, I got to see some incredible football action down south. Of course, USC was usually on the losing end of things, but that's beside the point.

I got to see the Gamecocks get hammered by Florida and (then #1) Alabama. I also got to see the Gamecocks get throttled by mediocre squads such as Kentucky and Clemson. The biggest win of the season for Coach Sparky Woods' troops came against Georgia — on the road. Don't get me wrong, being in the midst of 70,000 screaming SEC fans is a blast, even if the home team is getting romped.

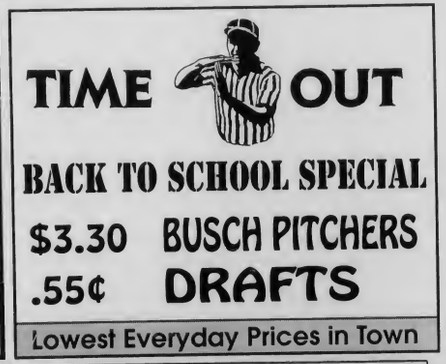
But I'll still take Lou Roe, Coach Cal and the Mullins Center over Steve Taneyhill, Sparky Woods and Williams– Brice Stadium any day of the week.

Did any of you hear about the controversy a few years back involving a supermarket called Food Lion selling spoiled meat? Did you ever wonder where a hell-hole like Food Lion could exist?

Well, I got to see a real, operational Food Lion, in-person in South Carolina. In fact, there was one located about a block from my dorm. I bought most of my beer there, but I didn't go near the meat department. Something about being dragged across the coals on 60 Minutes (or whatever program it was) for selling rotten meat tells me something about an establishment.

To be precise, it tells me not to buy anything that could have possibly been packaged on store premises. With this in mind, I decided to stick to the beer aisle.

Aside from Food Lion, another prominent supermarket chain in South Carolina was Piggly Wiggly. Say what? How can these folks take their store seriously? I can picture the conversation vividly.



"Where are you workin' now, Earl?"

"Well, I picked up a few hours workin' the deli at Piggly Wiggly. The benefits are great."

Piggly Wiggly. And people wonder what's wrong with America.

Philadelphia misses the mark

Movie is lost in flood of politically correct messages

COURTESY KEN REGAN

Antonio Banderas portrays Tom Hanks' life partner in Philadelphia.

THE REEL WORLD
by Jon Lupo

Philadelphia is a very Important Movie. As the first mainstream Hollywood movie to deal with AIDS and, to a lesser degree, homophobia and gay life, director Jonathan Demme (Silence of the Lambs) has a lot of baggage to carry. And while there's no doubting the film's long overdue need, Demme's easy moralizing and depthless characterization undercut what could have been a Landmark Movie.

Demme and screenwriter Ron Nyswaner (Mrs. Soffel) bend over backwards to do justice to the AIDS and gay communities, while at the same time satisfying the fickle tastes of the mainstream movie-going audience. In undertaking this rather laborious contortion, Philadelphia ends up painting itself into an uninspired, politically correct corner. There are plenty of messages, to be sure, but there is hardly a movie; and more seriously, there are hardly any characters.

Andrew Beckett (Tom Hanks) is a smart and talented gay lawyer at a high-powered, WASP-y Philadelphia law office. He's in the closet at work about his homosexuality — and the fact that he has AIDS. After a partner notices a lesion on his forehead, Beckett is fired, ostensibly for "losing" an important file. Beckett believes it was because he has AIDS and files a wrongful termination suit. After a number of lawyers turn down his case, Beckett goes to see Joe Miller (Denzel Washington), a personal injury lawyer known for his television commercials. Miller is immediately homophobic and AIDS-phobic, but reluctantly takes the case because, I guess, his sense of justice overrides his ignorance.

The film then takes the shape of a courtroom melodrama. The scenes are erratically staged; some moments are sharp and honest, others preachy and unbelievable. Demme uses this forum to try the audiences' values, and while it is an audacious attempt to liberalize a mass-movie audience who would rather be watching the comforting moronic-ness of Mrs. Doubtfire, Demme keeps sabotaging his own film.

In his earnestness to be P.C. and mainstream, he's created a film without any dimensional characters; instead there are merely types and representations — either noble and righteous do-gooders or sneering bigots. And the character that is supposed to be in between, Washington's Joe Miller, remains an enigma throughout — you're never quite sure when this transformation takes place. Some call it subtle, I call it non-existent.

COURTESY KEN REGAN

Denzel Washington as attorney Joe Miller.

Then there's Andrew Beckett, a living "saint" (right down to the not-so coincidental last name), who is so without flaws one wonders if Demme is trying to make Beckett a martyr or was so interested in creating a positive gay model, he didn't think shadings were necessary.

Beckett's life partner, the criminally underused Antonio Banderas (The Mambo Kings) is mere wallpaper — there's never an inkling of what his character must be going through; the hell of watching someone you love die. He's just as righteously inert as Beckett's astonishingly supportive family, headed by Joanne Woodward. At one point, after the family unanimously avows support, Beckett chimes, "Gee, I really love you guys," evoking — no kidding — uncomfortable parallels to "The Brady Bunch" (in fact, one of his brothers is a dead ringer for a balding Greg).

It's disheartening to note that the same director whose remarkable way of capturing diverse and complex characters ignited films like Melvin and Howard and of course, the unforgettable Hannibal Lecter in Silence of the Lambs, has created on its heels a film whose characters are so cursory and vague. Demme may have put a face on AIDS, but it's a face we ultimately can't recognize.

Philadelphia excels in its smaller moments, when the film drops its aura of liberal pretensions — whether it be its warm opening images of Philadelphia accompanied by Springsteen on the soundtrack, or a telling scene where Washington is picked up by a guy in a store. But the film is most powerful at the moments where the honest realities of AIDS supersedes the film's self-conscious reserve. I'm speaking of a moment where Beckett reveals his lesion- scarred torso to the jurors in the courtroom, or the day-to- day medical traumas Beckett endures. There's a refreshing unfiltered nature to these scenes, as Demme seems to realize there's no way to mainstream the reality of living with AIDS.

Tom Hanks is quite good — the flashes of realization as Hanks testifies, the disease ravaging through his body, mind and soul, is certainly compelling. However, they remain flashes in a wholly disparaging one-dimensional character. We're never given much to hold on to in terms of who Andrew Beckett really is, so the only way we view him is through his disease. Hanks' big Oscar-mugging scene is a monologue where he describes the subtleties of a Maria Callas aria from the opera "Andrea Chenier" to an awe- struck Washington, and is meant to be the fulcrum of Beckett's character. Alas, the red lighting, canted frames and raspy cries on life and love come off more like shameless manipulation.

The indisputable fact that Philadelphia remains frustratingly distant from its characters is never more clear than in the film's highly charged, five-hankie conclusion. Unfortunately, the sequence is played out with the potent but generic emotional sweep of a Hallmark commercial. Even on the second viewing, when I was bawling again, I realized I was weeping less for an Andrew Beckett I still didn't know, and more for the genuinely sad situation.

I don't want to come off as an ungrateful critic (though it may be too late), as I was truly rooting for Philadelphia to be a great movie — a triumph for all concerned. And maybe it's impossible to honestly depict AIDS (and homosexuality and homophobia) in mainstream Hollywood cinema. I can just imagine the executive meetings, deliberating whether Antonio Banderas should kiss Tom Hanks (they don't), or how graphic to get when depicting the disease. Courage comes in degrees, I guess, and for right here, right now, Philadelphia is as much courage as can be financially mustered. B-

Note: If you are interested in a few (much better) movies about AIDS, check out 1986's Parting Glances, 1990's Longtime Companion and the highly emotional documentaries Common Threads: Stories from the Quilt and Silverlake Life: The View from Here. In these films (especially the latter documentaries) the depth of understanding is profoundly affecting.

A Cinematic Winter Wrap-up:

Reviews sweep from Spielberg's Holocaust to the wild west

COURTESY SAM EMERSON

Wes Studi and Jason Patric star in Geronimo: An American Legend.

By JON LUPO
& ED HUMPHRIES
◆ Collegian Staff ◆

Schindler's List — Steven Spielberg, who just so happened to film the highest grossing film of all time seven months ago, re-creates the unblinking horror of the Holocaust as a vividly terrifying state of being. Spielberg not only shows you the sickening bravado of the Nazi officers as they arbitrarily shoot a one-armed Jewish man, the sinking dread of Jews being ushered into what they think is a gas chamber, the desperation of a little boy forced to hide in a foul makeshift toilet; he forces you become a part of it.

Spielberg resists his usual glossy movie pyrotechnics, opting for a seamless stream of jaw-dropping images with the swift immediacy of combat photography — showing the Holocaust not as a distant nightmare but an all-too plausible incubus of epic proportions. Liam Neeson is superb as Schindler, a war-profiteer turned humanitarian, aptly supported by Jewish accountant Itzhak Stern (Ben Kingsley) and Nazi officer Amon Goethe (Ralph Finnes). Finnes truly brings out the sadistic pathos deeply imbedded in Goethe's fractured psyche.

Although the film stumbles during Schindler's lachrymose farewell (this trumped-up blather betrays the enigmatic nature of Schindler's character), the film more than recovers in its infinitely moving coda. In the final analysis, it doesn't really matter if Spielberg doesn't win his much deserved Oscar — the film is testament enough to his genius. A (J.L.)

Geronimo — Weaving a western tapestry in all its majestic, sepia overtones, action director Walter Hill gallantly strides across the last days of the great Apache warrior Geronimo, serving up an exciting history tale well told. Wes Studi commands the screen as the fiery Geronimo, spurned into violent action when his people are marshalled into barren territory at the bequest of the belligerent "white- eye." Hill wisely juxtaposes quiet meditative scenes, with images of in-your-face violence as he racks a savage indictment on both sides of the fence.

The film boasts brilliant nuggets of performance. Best of all: Jason Patric as the cavalry officer charged with Geronimo's capture and Robert Duvall as an obsessed "Indian" hunter, Hill's western pulls the greatest revisionist punches; challenging our ignorance of the past while firing our internal ires towards intolerance. A- (E.H.)

The Pelican Brief — Julia Roberts uses this clunky, overlong John Grisham potboiler as her comeback vehicle, and while it may be a foolproof commercial choice, the film is a suspenseless bore. As perky law student Darby Shaw, Roberts uncovers a high-level conspiracy that assassinated two Supreme Court justices with a repetitive cycle of thriller cliches: breathless chases, tense phone calls, secluded hotel hideaways, etc. . . . Director Alan Pakula (All the President's Men, Presumed Innocent) should have taken a cue from the far superior adaptation of Grisham's The Firm and at least had an interesting cast to pick up the slack left over from his convoluted plot theatrics. Instead, a wasted Denzel Washington coasts on his charm (not a bad thing, but there's nothing else), while even Roberts' considerable star aura fails to lift her character above one-dimensionality. C- (J.L.)

Heaven and Earth — Perhaps the greatest tragedy in director Oliver Stone's swan song to his Vietnam trilogy, is that his heavy hand, balanced so precariously over past projects, has finally fallen and inflicts damages of its own. The true story of Le Ly Hyslip begins promisingly enough with a rich first half detailing the war waged on and within the psyche of the peaceful farming villages of Indonesia. Stone's grip tightens when he introduces Tommy Lee Jones' shattered GI, and as the film enters America the indictments fly on both sides with villainous ascension. Stone's real story is "in country," but his feelings of guilt and repent muddle his haunting eulogy to the pervasive casualties of way. Dr. Haing S. Ngor and Debbie Reynolds appear fleetingly. C (E.H.)

Schindler's List star Liam Neeson, as seen in Husbands and Wives.

The Air Up There — So stupid, so without an original plot twist, scene or line, the filmmakers must have gone through production in a constant state of deja vu. Kevin Bacon travels to Africa to find the next big basketball star, and in a silly, idiotic melding of Dances With Wolves and Hoosiers, things get even more inane. No points for guessing the ending (or beginning, or middle, or...) D- (J.L.)

Wayne's World 2 — Despite the vacuous absence of the original's "irreverence is hip" attitude (lack of plot is another matter), the second coming of Wayne and Garth (Mike Meyers, Dana Carvey) does offer some humorous moments. The real fun in this sequel is in watching this dynamic duo hurdle the numerous film references and celebrity cameos (Charlton Heston, anyone?). Best bits: a sound-effects enhanced, fully dubbed kung-fu battle royal between Meyers and karate flick staple James Hong and an out-of-left-field sendup of the Village People. Director Stephen Surjik knows well and captures the proceedings with a light and breezy air. B- (E.H.)

Tombstone — A dry gulch of a horse opera if ever there was one. It seems director George P. Cosmatos' (Rambo II) sole idea of a revisionist Western is to dress the good guys in black and lend some new age soliloquies and liberated femme fatales to the saddled mix, giving this take on the Wyatt Earp legend unearned prominence. Val Kilmer's reptilian Doc Holliday (a lizard king in chaps) may chew the scenery, but not before Kurt Russell's "acting in wild abandon" levels the entire film. Straight to Boot Hill for this oater. D (E.H.)

Cabin Boy — On their two-year stint with FOX's "Get a Life," comedian Chris Elliot and director Adam Resnick dug ores of comedic irreverence, telling the wayward tale of a boy who wouldn't grow up. The transition to this soggy fish-out-of-water tale wasn't kind. Elliot's prep school "fancy lad" makes his fantastic voyage along the bow of "The Filthy Whore" with a cast of old salts in tow (James Gammon, Brian Doyle Murray and Brion James) into the bowels of the Bermuda Triangle-ish Hell's Bucket. The humor sinks from the obvious to the ingratiating. David Letterman cameos in one of the film's few bright spots, but unfortunately the Tim Burton-produced animatronics and the "porno for pirates" humor can't bail the vehicle from failed self-referential submergence. D+ (E.H.)

tian of a futile love, the tune ends in Al Laughlin's pulsating and lively keyboard.

The Jamaiconed-out intro to "My Town" sets the up-tempo for a song just aching to jam. It ultimately falls back on the congo-bango percussion teasing of Jeep MacNichal, while Andy Sheldan drops a precise and conservative bassline. It's blazing work.

Acoustic territory is ventured into an "Birth of Words" and "Could it Be Another Change" and pulled off with passion and stroking gentleness.

"The only time I feel good falling/ is when I'm falling fast and hard for you." Lines like these leave even the most rigid of upper lips quivering ever so slightly.

The environmental conscience of The Samples was the driving force behind their more recent release No Room, and unfortunately it's not executed as well on the debut. Kelly's whines are especially needling on the greener tunes. "Close to the Fires," instead of being a strong plea for action, is more of an annoying poke in the ribs. This minor flaw is thankfully easily overlooked.

The Samples is warm, airy atmospherics executed to a "t." Grab your sweetie and hark back to the beginnings of a band hanging out on the cusp of success. B+

Crude literature promises a jaw dropping laugh per page

STERN STRIKES AGAIN

By Martin Brown ◆ Collegian Staff

"I was disgusted when I watched this filthy pornographic movie. Twice."

— The Principal in Porky's

The obave jake is an the same level as Howard Stern's new baak, Privote Parts. It also kind of illustrates how I feel abaut Stern: even though I knaw he is crude, vulgor and that he hos poor taste, I still can't help but laugh.

The book is certoinly nat far everyone. Anyone who is not easily offended, however, will find this baak very funny. Althaugh Private Parts may be among the mast obscene baaks ever to be put into print — almost nothing shocks me, but there were parts that made my jaw drop — there is at least one gaad laugh an each page.

Howard Stern is best known for his notianally-aired radia show that has made controversy Stern's trademark. Targeting the shaw, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) has fruitlessly demanded that Stern pay millions of dallars in fines. Stern also had his awn short- lived TV shaw that he abandaned, due nat ta paar ratings, but ta poor production quality. Recently, Stern had a pay- per-view special an New Year's Eve that was the most successful event in pay-per-view history (not including sports events) ever.

Private Parts begins with Stern's childhaad. He writes, "It was the warst of times, it was the warst af times." His mother "raised [him] like a veal" and his dad relentlessly picked on him.

Stern even talks abaut his sex life (big surprise). Believe it ar nat, he's been faithful ta his wife for 15 years. He admits that trying bondage with his wife "was a disaster. I tied Alison up. She started whining, 'My circulatian is getting cut off and that voice you put on is weird.'"

The baak mainly deals with Stern's years of working in radia. His confrontatians with management, his varaus guests and all the funny and weird stuff that has happened aver the years are all cavered.

One af the best chapters is "Stuttering Jahn, Hero af the Stupid." John, one af Stern's interns, is a stutterer wha goes ta celebrity events and asks stars annoying, tasteless questians such as the following, directed at Dr. Ruth Westheimer.

"Is it possible ta be in love with a girl and her dog at the same time?"

John's advantage, of course, is that the stars can't ignore him because they can't risk being seen as insensitive ta the handicapped. When you think about it, it's a pretty ingenious idea.

Other classic Stuttering-Jahn-moments include asking Robert Redford, "How did you keep a straight face when you were looking at Barbara Streisand's nose?" and questioning Billy Joel, "When you look at your wife, Christie Brinkley, do you thank your mather for making you take piana lessans?"

Private Parts is 447 pages lang, full of pictures and costs $23 in the hard-cover versian.

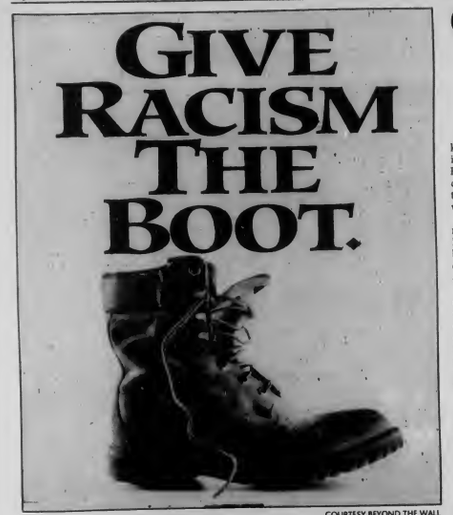
The University Health Services IS...

... a major medical center. It is staffed by Board Certified physicians, licensed psychologists, nurse practitioners, physician assistants and a variety of support staff who have a specific interest in the college age population. We are accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations (JCAHO) and Accreditation Association for Ambulatory Health Care (AAAHC). During the 1993 fiscal year, there were 103,108 visits to UHS. This number includes appointments to the Dental Clinic, the Eye Program and Physical Therapy as well as the general Medical and Urgent care clinics.

...able to provide many services without additional charges beyond the Basic Health Fee. Therefore, you have already paid for these services as part of your tuition if you have registered for more than five credits.



...comprehensive. Practically every health concern you have can be dealt with here. From a hang nail to hospitalization for the flu, you can be treated here. From diagnosis to treatment to follow up care, the UHS is equipped in terms of staff and facilities to help you. In a life threatening emergency, you will be seen immediately.

The University Health Services IS NOT...

...staffed by medical students. Some medical students recieve part of their training here but your permission is always sought before you are to be examined by a medical student. In fact we encourage you to have a regular provider (a physician, nurse practitioner or physician), someone you see every time you come here.

...always free. Some services are not covered by the Basic Health Plan. For these services you pay a small additional fee called a co-payment when you come here. If you have bought the Supplemental Health Benefits Plan some of these fees will be paid for.

...a walk in clinic. Call before you come here even in urgent situations. By calling first, you will get specific directions about what to do, whom to see and how soon to come. For all other types of care, call to make an appointment. If you call before 10:00 a.m. you may even get an appointment the same day.

Creative marketers transform advertisements into art

By EMILY MARINO
◆ Collegian Staff ◆

Amidst the scheduling conflicts, unpacking and trips to our beloved book annex, it's nice to know that at least one aspect of returning to school promises to be mildly fun. For all of you scissor-laden, magazine ad junkies, the beginning of the semester means prime dorm room/apartment wall decorating opportunities.

With you guys in mind, creative marketers Brian Gordon and Dennis Roche of Beyond The Wall have combined the worlds of advertisement and art to present a catalog of your favorite advertisements in poster-size.

"The idea is simple: If you like the ad, you'll love the poster," explain the industrious duo in their catalog. The catalog itself features 20 posters that display everything from basketball star Shaquille O'Neil to the childhood staple, Oreo cookies, and promote a range of products that covers spring water to sunglasses.

"This is the first time anything like this has been done," says Gordon. "So far we've been really excited about it."

Gordon and Roche are currently sending their catalog to 80 colleges and universities across the country to launch the first round of what they hope will become a semesterly mailing.

Gordon first thought of the idea as an undergraduate at the University of Pennsylvania, two years ago. He noted an overwhelming trend of students cutting out magazine ads or taking banners from sporting events and placing them on their walls.

"You can't buy this stuff anywhere," he realized, observing that the same, limited selection of traditional posters seemed to be for sale year after year.

Gordon's idea did not become a marketable reality until about a year later, while he was working for Proctor and Gamble. Gordon discussed his observations with then-co- worker Roche, who was immediately interested in helping the idea mature. The two quit their jobs and created Beyond The Wall, which they currently operate out of Westport, Conn.

According to Gordon, he and Roche conducted surveys that revealed that 70 percent of college students have taken the scissors to a magazine for wall-decorating purposes.

Furthermore, a survey of 300 ads by Connecticut college students informed them of which posters would sell in such a market.

The result is a variety of poster-size ads that you might expect to find in a dorm room. Some posters display classic standbys like scantily-clad, shapely women and muscular men, or hot cars. Others feature symbols like the Statue of Liberty, funky graphics, photographs of scenic mountains, or political messages about feminism or racism.

Gordon explains that in addition to the artistic quality of the posters, products advertised must appeal to the college student audience. He says that products such as Coca-Cola, Ray Ban sunglasses and Volkswagen cars are considered relevant to the market, while something like Head and Shoulders Shampoo would not fare as well.

Advertisers pay for catalog space as they would pay a magazine, and all posters are copyrighted.

Gordon says that these posters will appeal to ad-cutting, tape-sticking traditionalists and eventually replace the actual ads (which cost only the price of the magazine), because they are larger and of excellent quality color-wise and print- wise.

"We would like to be the place college kids buy their posters from," says Gordon. "We're really happy to have done this."

Beyond The Wall catalogs will be available to students as inserts in tomorrow's Collegian.

music scene. As a result, in the late '70s there was a ska explosion in the UK, as The Specials, English Beat, The Clash, Joe Jackson, Elvis Costello and The Police incorporated the ska sound as a backbone to their music. From the Police's "Roxanne" to Costello's "Watching the Detectives" to the Clash's "London Calling," the essence of ska contributed to a unique, new sound.

The Skavoovee tour proved that ska is still alive and kicking, and branching out into new directions. The Mighty Mighty Bosstones combined ska horns and rhythm with a metal guitar sound to drive their latest album Don't Know How to Party to new and popular heights. Colorado's Somples enjoy continued success with their folk-rock/ska blend of music.

Through bands like this and tours like Skavoovee, the ska sound will live on.

As much as I love to poke fun at my southern experience, I have to say that it was well worth the trip. I'm pleased to be back at UMass, that's for sure, but I was exposed to some pretty interesting things.

I saw the cities of Atlanta and Charlotte for the first time, followed the saga of quarterback Steve Toneyhill first-hand, spent a weekend at Myrtle Beach, met some interesting southern folks, and, most importantly, spent all the free time I could muster hanging out at Piggly Wiggly and Happy Mart.

themselves exploining that the past 20 years of the business has created artists as it has created pop music stars.

Going through 10 chapters, dealing with issues of inspiration, blocks, exhibiting without rejection, financial independence and other crazy ideas, Reid covers a broad base in a very straightforward and no-frills style. She manages to go from issues of rents in New York City to the very heart of what she believes art is.

Although not an art major myself, I feel that this book could be very useful to those who are interested in getting into the business.

This book is already being used at over 160 universities, as well as having been ordered for museum shops such as the Guggenheim in Soho, the Contemporary Art Museums in San Francisco, Chicago and Los Angeles, as well as museums from other parts of the world.

So for those looking to plunge into the "real world" of jobs and careers, this might be a work to look into for insights and experiences. But even for those who are not interested in the business side of the art world, Reid gives her perspectives of what we call art.

"From our unlimited means of expression, and from our freedom to use our special personal knowledge as we think best, we help people to examine the world and themselves...this is the wonderful satisfaction of art and of being an artist."

Snow

Ten reasons New Englanders ironically fail winter's frosty test...year after year

By Andrew Bryce ◆ Collegian Staff

Snow.

Ah, the beautiful representation of the winter season. The key element of the typical Christmas holidays.

The peaceful nature of those gorgeous white flakes floating to the ground.

The gentleness of snowflakes hitting against the nose.

The feeling of warmth of the snow despite the cold air that it is produced in.

The feeling of exhilaration as you are speeding down the slopes, or flying down the hill on a Thundertube.

The feeling of exuberance as you are able to crank someone off the head with a snowball from a long distance.

Let it snow, let it snow, let it snow.

That particular perspective of snowfall is a positive one. It is too bad that the problems we, as New Englanders face, overshadow this glorified view of the snow.

Here are ten of those:

1. The roads. The biggest problem of them all. The snow hits the roads, it accumulates, and it freezes over, thus creating havoc. The plows come out about a minute after the first flake hits. It's too bad that they leave a damn sheet of ice for people to skid, slide and spin on. Side roads? Forget about it. It would be just too much work to maneuver the plow. If you could ever drive around my neighborhood, you would think they used a damn zamboni. My buddy Sean had an interesting view on this.

"We can put a man on the moon, but we can't get frozen water off the ground," he said. Something to think about it. Whoever develops a successful method, Sean says, could be a possible Nobel Prize winner. Good luck to those who try.

2. Snow being the end of the world. Here in New England, we freak out. Before the plow comes out, before the snow is even close to falling, we have our cupboards stocked with the necessities. You would think it was the end of the world. This past Christmas break, my friend Adam and I were watching the news back home. Twenty-five minutes were devoted to a possible snowfall, and five minutes were devoted to sports. As if there were nothing else going on in the world but the storm. The meteorologists steal the airtime, and provide many useless angles of what a possible two-inch snow storm might produce.

3. Getting the car started. There is nothing as enjoyable as getting up an hour early to beg your car to start. It's a pain in the rear just to get it started, much less taking your life into your own hands by driving to your destination. The morning consists of pumping the gas pedal; fearing that you may flood it, testing your patience as you plead with the car to start, and flipping out as it refuses to. Especially when you are by yourself. The sight of people yelling at their cars at 7 o'clock in the morning is a sight to see. Scraping the windows as they are covered by ice is another fun activity that leads to insanity.

4. Shoveling. Now there is one activity that is good for the back — especially if you have the cheap plastic shovels I have. During the past two storms I stayed at my friends' houses, figuring I'd get out of shoveling. Yeah right. Shoveling my friends' driveway, as well my own, was not my original plan. Hopefully others will learn from my mistake. I would also like to thank the heartless person who plowed the dead-end in the front of my house. Great; the dead-end is plowed, but they also leave a giant block of snow in front of the driveway. Awesome. Thanks, Mr. Plowman. Snow blower? Financially, it is not possible, and I have greedy neighbors who laugh at me as I struggle with my killer red, plastic shovel.

5. Slush. The next best thing to ice. Description of slush? Does sloppy, wet and painfully annoying do the job? That is, of course, when it is not frozen. When it is frozen? Sloppy, crunchy and even more painfully annoying. Next to a solid sheet of ice, slush is a driver's nightmare.

6. Trying to walk in it. Trouble sets in. The art of putting one foot first, followed by the other is deeply affected by snow. Who hasn't embarrassingly fallen on their face in the snow? A successful fall is when you can laugh at your clumsiness upon impact. Problems arise from debating on whether you should concentrate on what you are doing, or concentrating too much. Has anyone ever tried to wear chains on their shoes? Relax, I haven't. Yet.

7. The zapper. There is a problem when a person starts to sing "Informer" upon seeing the snow. You know, the dude that sounds like a Jamaican...and someone starts singing the song because of the...alright, alright, so no one has ever done it in front of me. Bad attempt at a joke.

8. Colored snow. The beautiful bright, white shade of snow is a sight to see — until other substances ruin the color. Not only do sand plows and dogs wreck the appearance, but they also endanger children. Remember when we as children used to eat the snow. Stay away from the yellow snow, my mother used to say. Like I was going to start chomping on the colored snow, Ma.

9. Powdery snow. Not necessarily the biggest problem of them all, but one to those who love playing in the snow. Powdery snow means no snowballs and no snowman. Talk about useless snow.

10. Amazing. It is truly amazing that I can spend this much time complaining about the snow.

I guess I am a true New Englander.

Blood supply running low

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

There is such a critical shortage of blood at Massachusetts hospitals that the American Red Cross has been asking all eligible donors to give blood this week at the Cape Cod Lounge all this week, a Red Cross employee said yesterday.

Jodi Liquornik, a Red Cross donor recruitment specialist, said blood supply is so low hospitals are now only performing the most necessary surgery.

"Usually we keep a four-day supply of blood on our shelves, but now we are down to a one-day supply," Liquornik said. "Hospitals are now postponing elective surgeries."

Liquornik said a single blood donation can help three people because the blood is broken down into plasma, red blood cells and platelets. She also said blood has a wide variety of medicinal uses, from the treatment of hemophiliacs and cancer patients to babies and accident victims.

Liquornik stressed the fact that giving blood is safe and that the blood is tested for diseases before it is delivered to hospitals.

"People can't get AIDS giving blood," she said. "Some people are worried about that their first time. All of the blood is tested for 11 different diseases at our testing lab in Dedham."

Liquornik said the process of donating blood takes about one hour. She said after people register they go over their health history with a nurse and their vital signs are checked. Donors can then go to the "canteen" to be nourished while they wait to give slightly less than a pint of blood. The Red Cross gets 20 percent of its blood from college students, Liquornik said.

Nancy Marion, a Red Cross employee who has been assisting Liquornik in recruiting donors this week, said they have reached their goal for the amount of blood they wanted to take in each day this week. She said their goal was to was collect 110 blood samples yesterday. Marion also said The University Women, a group made up of faculty and the wives of professors, has volunteered to help run the blood drive all this week.

"The response by the students has been very good," said Norma McCartney, one of the volunteers. "We have collected over 100 units today and we have made 10 appointments."

Matthew Bertucci, a freshman pre-veterinary major, said he donated his blood because he felt obligated to because he is an eligible donor.

"It's a nice thing to do if you can," Bertucci said. "Not everyone can give blood, but if you can you should do it because a lot of people need it."

Health fight keeps going

By CHRIS CONNELL
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The White House offered concessions on the scope of its health plan Wednesday just hours after President Clinton drew a no-exceptions line on universal coverage.

Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole pronounced the Clinton health plan "in trouble," but Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., asserted that Americans won't stand for a Republican filibuster.

The president met with committee chairmen to map strategy for the struggle over the Clinton Health Security Act and a half-dozen competing bills.

The president later canceled a speech at a local school on doctors' orders to recover his voice.

Treasury Secretary Lloyd Bentsen told business groups that Clinton was willing to let more big companies self- insure rather than being forced into the regional alliance where most Americans would have to buy their insurance.

White House press secretary Dee Dee Meyers also said that while Clinton stands firm on universal coverage, the timetable for achieving it is "something that has to be worked out."

> "We don't need a triple bypass to take care of the health care delivery system or this massive dose of government that President Clinton proposes."
> – Bob Dole

House Speaker Thomas Foley said, "It's possible you will have some kind of phase-in."

"His program is in trouble," Dole said on NBC-TV. Repeating his argument that the current system works well for 85 percent of Americans, Dole told Fox-TV, "We don't need a triple bypass to take care of the health care delivery system or this massive overdose of government that President Clinton proposes."

Bentsen acknowledged that big business has problems with Clinton's proposal to force all companies with up to 5,000 employees into regional insurance purchasing alliances.

"You think the 5,000-employee threshold...is too high," he told the National Association of Manufacturers and a pension group.

"We hear you. We're willing to discuss this one and the other details of our plan."

"We got the concept right, but the president couldn't have been more clear when he said we're open for discussion on this on this as well as other issues," said Bentsen.

Workers set to reinforce roof as Mullins initiates face-lift

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Staff

The William D. Mullins Center, home of the University of Massachusetts basketball team and ice hockey, will undergo its own "home improvements" next month to increase its resistance to stress and will possibly add a stand-by ambulance at certain events.

A study is currently being held by engineers of the UMass Building Authority, to examine the $51 million arena's resistance to moderate earthquakes. The UMass Building Authority constructed the Mullins Center.

State officials for Public Safety have concluded that the Mullins is built to withstand high winds and the state Board of Building Regulations said that it is no longer a requirement of the university to shut down the arena when winds exceed 55 miles per hour.

A temporary occupancy certificate, a requirement of the state building code, has been extended until February 28 in order for the study to be completed.

A permanent occupancy certificate will not be issued until all modifications have been done, and all requirements have been fulfilled.

The study is being conducted after a concern raised by the attorney general's office for seismic activity and wind codes.

Mullins will be making minor modifications to the structure in the area directly below the roof. They are inserting pins, cutting two cross braces, and adding welds to allow stress to be more evenly distributed in extreme seismic activity.

"Even though a final determination relative to seismic considerations has not been completed," said Paul J. Page, vice-chancellor for administration and finance, "we have decided to take the conservative approach and make these enhancements as recommended by the engineers now."

All work will be done at night so it will not interfere with normal operations of the arena. The changes will cost about $130,000 and be paid for from UMass Building Authority funds. The process is expected to take four to six weeks.

Also adding to the list of improvements is the possible addition of a stand-by ambulance at events with 5,000 or more spectators.

ARAM COMJEAN/COLLEGIAN
The William D. Mullins Center will soon undergo roof improvements as part of a refurbishing project at the arena.

In December, the Hampshire County Commissioners wrote a letter to Ogden Entertainment requesting them to provide an ambulance to the 10,000 seat arena. Ogden often provides emergency medical technicians on site during most of their events.

All emergency services are provided by Amherst Public Safety and were still providing ambulances to Mullins as of press time.

The letter was written after an ambulance was called to a Mullins Center event. An ambulance from Northampton was dispatched because all Amherst ambulances were on call. It took the ambulance 20-30 minutes to reach the center.

Town commissioners have expressed concern in not adding additional work for the town and the town fire fighters. The request for ambulances is not in accordance with the attorney generals request for structural modification.

Budget still tight as freeze ends

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Staff

As of Jan. 1, the hiring freeze which affected the whole commonwealth was lifted at the University of Massachusetts.

However, chancellors in the UMass five-campus system are advised to be frugal in the hiring of new posts.

"It is always impossible to have an absolute hiring freeze," said Chancellor David K. Scott. The hiring freeze exempted student employees funded through grants and contracts.

This frugality at the UMass-Amherst campus could possibly come in the form of 158 staff cuts by 1995 if funding to the University is not increased. One hundred faculty cuts would save the University $5 million, estimating the average faculty salary at $50,000.

Although the UMass system received $13 million more from the State Legislature this year, the system still faces a budget crisis. The five-campus UMass system has requested an additional $23 million in state funding for 1995. If the state honors the request, UMass-Amherst will receive approximately $11 million.

The cuts are a part of what Scott called a "strategic planning process to benefit the institution." The University has a deficit this year of about $8 million in the total budget of $414 million. It is projected that the deficit would go up $6.5 million if state funding or student fees are not increased.

According to Scott, raising student fees at the second-most expensive public school in the country is highly discouraged by University administrators, and he said he wants to increase revenue through private and corporate funding, alumni and by "looking into other options."

Scott said the University will try to "minimize the number of reductions" but will make a request to increase the budget and funding from the state. The cuts are a response to a hopeless situation if revenue from the state is not increased.

"We will try to find ways of stretching out the actions that we have to take," Scott said.

Fifty-eight staff positions would be eliminated over an 18- month

Bankrupt tavern's fate still in limbo

ARAM COMJEAN/COLLEGIAN
Twister's Tavern

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

The history behind Twisters is long and complex, involving the entire community, from university students to elderly residents in a neighboring apartment complex. The future of the establishment remains unclear.

William Miller of Holyoke appealed to the Amherst Zoning Board of Appeals in early December to try and get a permit for operation. Miller, who runs an energy consulting business, was planning to purchase the tavern from the U.S. Bankruptcy Court for $100,000.

His proposal for the business includes a pub-style tavern with a capacity of 122 people inside and 55 on the patio.

The ZBA voted 2-1 in favor of Miller's plan, but that vote is moot because town zoning bylaws require that special permit approvals must be unanimous.

Edward Sunderland, a member of the ZBA, used past complaints as consideration when casting his negative vote. Neighbors of the establishment urged the ZBA to reject the permit.

Students react to new, larger Collegian

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

It was the first day back to school. New classes, new books, new teachers, new faces and to add to it all – a new Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

After 25 years, the Collegian has finally taken a new step in going broadsheet. The decision was based on a want for more space for articles and advertisements.

The paper is no longer a small size of 11 x 17inches, but has regular newspaper proportions of 14 x 22 1/2 inches.

So far, the new size of the paper has caused a great deal of attention. Several editors said more writers have come down and are attracted to the "new Collegian". The Union News has also called and are writing a news story on the new broadsheet size.

Since the Collegian is written for the students, faculty and administration on campus, we asked over a dozen people at UMass how they feel about the bigger sized newspaper.

Ryan Crowell, a first-year student at Holyoke Community College who will be transferring here next year, said he feels the new size is much better.

"It seems to cover a lot more. Before it seemed to be just a little college paper from some little school. We have over 26,000 people here at this school and this size seems to fit that. You can really get the scope of things going on here at UMass," he said.

"I think the new size is fine. It seems to be a little bit bigger with more information, which is better," said Prescott Smith, a doctoral student.

Lisa Manness, a junior animal science major, said the Collegian looks more professional now. "Because it is bigger, there is a lot more information and it looks better," she said.

"I like it better because it seems to give the paper more of an appearance, more credibility. I also noticed the material inside is different. The cartoons are better and

Dead Headed Decision

Fans of the musical group the Grateful Dead are generally stereotyped as a peace loving, marijuana smoking group, who, despite being fanatically loyal are on the most part a harmless lot.

A group of "Deadheads," as the group's fans are often called, in Chapel Hill, N.C. showed a little more angry side.

Last November, University of North Carolina Chancellor Paul Hardin decided to not allow the 1960's musical group to play on campus at Dean Smith Center.

Last week, he was paid back.

On Wednesday, January 20th, the Chancellor's Country Club Road home was vandalized, according to The Daily Tar Heel, the student newspaper at UNC. Obscenities and graffiti, such as "Grateful Dead" and "Dead Rules," was spray–painted all over his university–owned home.

Hardin and his wife were out of town during the vandalism and police did not know how much it would cost to repair the damage.

In December about a dozen Grateful Dead fans protested Hardin's decision. The Chancelior cited safety concerns and traffic problems for his dismissal of the Jerry Garcia led group.

Some of the band's fans are upset with the vandalism, saying that it is something the band would not approve of.

"We [Deadheads] are so against even litter and anything like this," said UNC sophomore and Dead fan Angie Rosser. "That's why this is so uncharacteristic."

Imagine what will happen if Hardin denies Guns 'n Roses.

Booze Cruise

While you may not consider Idaho, or the University of Idaho, to be hot spots for partying, these guys apparently get it done up there.

Unfortunately, a little too much. A couple of fraternities at the University are no on deep probation after they served alcohol to a underage sorority member last August. Later that night she fell from a third floor fire escape of her house, according to The Argonaut, the student newspaper on campus.

Apparently Regena Coghlan, the sorority sister who suffered the accident had been drinking at Sigma Alpha Epsilon and Beta Theta Pi earlier in the evening.

SAE was throwing a "Jack Daniels Birthday Party," while the Beta House was having a party called, "50 ways to lose your liver." Coghlan is said to have had a few JD's at his birthday party.

In putting the two houses on probation Magistrate Bill Hamlett said, "The purpose of this (decision) is to throw–up a no–alcohol wall around the fraternity."

Whether Hamlett made the correct decision or not, I think any judicial opinion concerning alcohol probation does not need to contain language such as, "throw–up."

Twin Peaks

A Northeastern University senior football and basketball player, Lamont Hough, is in some hot water for allegedly impersonating his twin brother and tricking his brother's girl friend into having sex with him.

New York Newsday, and The Northeastern News reported that Hough, who lives on Long island, went to his brother's girlfriend and asked her for sex. The woman, unaware that it was not her boyfriend consented, but the next morning was told by Hough that he was not who she thought he was. She filed charges of rape.

Nassau County's District Attorney's office is currently reviewing the situation and may file a charge of criminal impersonation, after a District Court Judge threw out the rape charge.

Winter weather wears East

Snowy, sub–zero climates cause problems for people

By MIKE MOKRZYCKI
Associated Press

Once upon a time, way back in the 1980s and early 1990s, some people in the East complained that winters just weren't like they used to be.

You don't hear that complaint anymore.

"Personally, I'd like to see myself in the month of June right now," said Ken Dionne, an oil serviceman in Madawaska in northernmost Maine. He worked overnight removing fliters from tanks outside of trailer homes because the oil was turning to gel as temperatures dropped to minus 37 degrees.

More snow hit the East and parts of the Midwest on Wednesday, the latest in a month long succession of snow and ice storms and deep freezes.

No sooner did that storm move out to sea, after leaving up to six inches of snow in the New York City area, than another big snowstorm formed over the central Plains and began lumbering toward the Northeast, leaving as much as a foot of snowing northwestern Kansas.

"This is what it used to be like when I was a kid," Vince Carita, 30, said as he shoveled out his driveway in Titusville, N.J. "I guess people have forgotten."

> "This is what it used to be like when I was a kid. I guess people have forgotten."
> – Vince Carita

There was a January thaw in some parts of the East this week and it wound up causing more problems.

Ice that broke was jamming and causing flooding that forced at least 12 homes to be evacuated Wednesday along Wheeling Creek in West Virginia and pushed water over the roads along Loyalhanna Creek near Latrobe, Pa., the National Weather Service reported.

Many cities and towns are running out of rock salt, in part because trucks that would restock the supply have been getting stuck on icy roads. Trains and barges also have been blocked, said Catherine Bolton, spokeswoman for Akzo Salt Inc. of Clarks Summit, Pa., a major salt supplier east of the Mississippi.

"It's a terrible Catch–22. You can't get through to get the salt through."

Akzo has ample supplies of salt from its mines, but has gotten 20 times more orders this month than last January, she said. "All those orders at once, we're not able to completely fill them. So we're going to give a little to everybody," she said.

When roads do get a chance to thaw, they crumble, causing gaping, front–end–warping potholes. Assuming that spring does eventually get here, the problem will only worsen.

New GEO contract increases funding

By JUSTIN DOYLE
Collegian Staff

Negotiations between the Graduate Employee Organization and the University of Massachusetts finished last semester and many of the changes to the graduate employees' contract have begun this semester.

The changes affect such areas as diversity, discrimination, health care and stipends.

The Graduate Employee Organization succeded in make several changes to their contract. One of the major areas that GEO wanted to improve was the issue of diversity. The University has agreed to increase the budget of the Office for Minority Graduate Student Recruitment fellowship and the Teaching Assistant fund by $20,000 this year and by an additional $60,000 in the fall of 1995, for a total increase of 50 percent of the current budget for this fund.

"The University promised that funding for the office will increase at the least by 50 percent," said the co–speaker of GEO Mark Parker. "It will help to provide more fellowships for minority graduate students."

"There are 360 minority graduate students attending the University," Parker said. "About 80 will receive fellowships. The new funding will double that number."

> "There are 360 minority graduate students attending the University. About 60 will receive fellowships."
> –Mark Parker

The University of Massachusetts has allocated $100,000 to implement diversity training for TAs through the Center For Teaching. TAs will be hired to do ongoing training for graduate employees around issues of racism and diversity on campus.

"The University holds workshops every year on racism and diversity," said Parker. "Two new TAs will be hired along with an assistant to work for the Center For Teaching at the workshop. They will also help the teachers and TAs if they have problems with a minority student."

The University agreed to stipend increases. Graduate employees will receive the same percentage as other unionized state employees. The University will also submit an additional $1 million request for stipend increases.

"In the next two years, if the University gets an increase in funding, the graduate employees will receive no less than a $1 million increase in stipends, to be divided up in the departments," said Parker. "Employees may receive up to $800 increase in stipends. But, it depends on state legislature."

Graduate student employees will also receive more health care coverage. This year the University will pay for 85 percent of an employee's health care which is up from 79 percent, according to Parker.

Meeting centers on UM direction

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

In an effort to show that the University of Massachusetts deserves more money and legislative support, UMass President Michael K. Hooker, Chancellor David Scott, the student trustee and faculty and staff from the five UMass campuses system met with state legislators at a luncheon in the Campus Center last Thursday.

Hooker's spokesman Bill Wright said the luncheon was an opportunity for UMass to bring legislators up to date on what progress the University is making and what contributions it is making to the community. The luncheon featured presentations on Teaching and Learning, Economic Development and Diversity and Pluralism, the three system– wide priority objectives, Wright said. Several members of the state education committee attended.

Scott said the luncheon was a success because there was a great deal of debate about the direction the University system should be taking.

"I was very pleased with the luncheon," Scott said. "There was so much discussion and interest that the luncheon ran on way past the time scheduled for it. There were some key members of the education committee there and there was a lot of open dialogue about the direction the University should be taking."

Scott also said Hooker is planning on developing a "report card" that would be presented to the state legislature. The report card would evaluate the University system and update the legislature on what progress the five colleges have made.

Lizana said although he was pleased the University had an opportunity to show lawmakers why an increase in the state appropriation is needed, he also said the luncheon would have been more productive if more legislators outside of the education committee had attended.

"It was a good opportunity for the University to sell itself to the legislators, which is something that up until this year the University has not done a good job of at all," Lizana said. "But it was kind of like preaching to the choir. Most of the people there were already supportive of the University. The people who we needed to work on were not there. We needed more representatives from the House ways and means committee."

Lizana, who made a presentation about the racial climate at the luncheon, said the University system is trying to convince legislators to vote for a 7.1 percent increase in its state appropriation. He also said the University is hoping for an increase in the amount of non–loan aid in the state financial aid pool.

"Most of the presentations at the luncheon made it very clear that the University can not make any improvements unless there is an increase in funding," he said. "The legislators understand that, but the problem is that this year there is a lot of big expensive things that they have to find money for."

Russian exchange offered

By DARIENNE J. HOSLEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is playing a part in the reform efforts in Russia through an expanding exchange program started by the School of Management.

Graduate and undergraduate students familiar in Slavic languages can earn a six–month business certificate. Ten students will be accepted, and will spend the first three months at the University and the second three months in Russia.

Robert Hopley, a visiting lecturer in the department of management since 1986, said the program offers base level support to reform by working with companies and businesses directly, and teaching them new methods of doing business.

While he believes Russian President Boris N. Yeltsin's Cabinet is working against progress toward a free–market economy, Hopley said the directional turn may be a more practical approach.

"It's definitely reflecting what happened in the [Dec. 12] elections," Hopley said. "People said, 'Slow down, maintain our living standards to some degree.'"

According to Hopley, who has visited St. Petersburg, Russia five times in the past two years, a Russian university lecturer's salary can provide only a place to live. Without an extra job, there simply isn't enough for food or clothes.

Yeltsin's primary U.S. adviser, Jeffrey Sachs of Harvard University, told the Boston Globe last week that he had lost hope that true reform would succeed in Russia. He said the new government would be "incoherent and quite possibly corrupt."

"What they were trying to do wasn't working," Hopley said. "I disagreed with [Sach's] advice. I just don't think it fit the Russian situation."

Hopley said the top–down approach was an attempt to "reinvent the market by ignoring the employer." The transition to a free market should be made slowly, he said, and should directly address the needs of companies and small businesses.

Hopley believes reform will work in Russia. Support, he said, is stronger among those under 40.

"It tends to be generational. Younger people are more inclined to jump on the new bandwagons," he said.

Applications to the exchange program are due March 15.

The program began when five Russians spent the spring semester at UMass in 1991. Faculty from the School of Management first visited St. Petersburg in September 1991, and have continued to spend time in Russia teaching courses on basic accounting and finance, development of economic laws, and the pros and cons of various compensation systems.

Opinion

Bursar's Office misrepresents fee

The Issue: The Bursar's Office claims the Activities Fee pays for subscriptions to the Index and the Collegian.

Our opinion: The Activities Fee does not support the Index or the Collegian — both organizations are self-supporting.

The 'Bursar's Notes' insert which accompanied undergraduate tuition bills this semester contains a section detailing the list of fees and what they are used for.

For example, the Arts Fee supports a variety of events "for the cultural enrichment and enjoyment of the student body."

The Athletic Fee goes towards "comprehensive men's and women's intercollegiate programs."

And the Curriculum Support Fee is really tuition disguised as a fee — a very large fee.

It is not the ever-increasing number of fees with which we take issue, however, but the representation of one fee in particular: the Activities Fee.

According to the insert, payment of the Activities Fee includes, among other things, "a subscription to the daily student newspaper and the annual yearbook."

The Collegian regrets to inform our readers that the Bursar's Office has made some promises they simply cannot keep.

The reason? Both the Collegian and the Index, the annual yearbook, are self-supporting. Neither receives any money from the Activities Fee — or any other fee paid by UMass students.

The two student organizations rely on advertising sales to produce their publications. The Collegian is able to distribute free-of-charge, while the Index must charge a nominal fee of about $25 per yearbook.

The Activities Fee does support a diverse assortment of Registered Student Organizations which receive their funding from the Student Government Association.

Unfortunately, the Bursar's Office has chosen to sell the fee to students by using two organizations which receive absolutely no money from it.

The Collegian is disappointed that the Bursar's Office would misrepresent the Activities Fee, as well as our organization, to every undergraduate at the University of Massachusetts.

Their mistake perpetuates a long-standing misconception that the Collegian charges students for our paper, when the reality is that we provide UMass and the Five College Area with a daily newspaper as a service to the community — at no charge.

A few of my favorite things

Hello. This is my first "Notes" column, and I would like to take this opportunity to tell you the things that I am going to remember about UMass when I graduate this spring.

One of my favorite parts of the UMass educational experience so far would have to be the Radical Student Union's noontime get–togethers on the Student Union steps. As soon as the first thaw hits, every person with a complaint about anything will hit the rallies with full force.

For those of you who have never attended one of these circuses, I highly recommend it. There's just something about listening to a group of six friends yell about six different subjects that really makes you laugh to yourself all day, and I always enjoy a good laugh at someone else's expense.

Lisa Jezowski
Notes from the Campus Center Basement

And every time I think I'm acting silly I just think of our protesting friends who move the location of their rallies just to give the appearance that anyone actually attended...

Speaking of rallies and radicals, you... the one with the MIM Notes... you can't hide any longer. I saw you last semester dropping off the November issue on the Campus Center concourse. I know who you are...

* * * *

I've been at this school for four long years, but it still amazes me just how stupid the higher–ups at this school must think we students are.

At the end of last semester I went to the library to do some research for a final project. I walked over to copy some pages of my book, and, lo and behold, there were some additions to the copy machine that hadn't been there the last time I'd gone to use it. The folks in the library had sealed off the buttons that allow you to reduce the size of your copy and fit two pages of a book on one sheet of paper.

I always wanted to believe that this school did not simply want to rob me blind, but I cannot believe that any longer.

The candy–wrapper drive must not have worked, so now they're just forcing you to give them money instead.

Yay, UMass.

* * * *

Hey everyone, seniors especially, the UMass Bursar's Office has decided to be generous this year. They've promised each and every undergrad a FREE yearbook. It's in the "Bursar's Notes — Spring 1994" that you received with your semester bill.

Thank you, Bursar! Be advised, however, that with an estimated undergraduate population that is around 17,000 multiplied by at least $25 per yearbook, I think that check is going to require a second signature. Make it out to the Index.

I don't know about everyone else, but not having to spend money on a yearbook this year will sure be nice.

* * * *

One last thing I certainly enjoy about UMass is that people are oh so patient. In a world of clogged hallways, a Campus Center that is impassable at lunchtime, a constant line for services in the library and other research facilities, it is necessary to relax sometimes and wait your turn. For those of us who were here when Add–Drop meant waiting in line for 5 hours starting at the crack of dawn, this was a lesson learned early on in our college careers.

It does seem, however that some of us have not learned this important fact of life. One such person that comes to mind is the certain Whitmore administrator that I saw at the UMass v. St. Bonaventure men's basketball game at the Mullins Center.

As my friend and I waited in line behind approximately eight other people this Whitmore hack (as I like to call 'em) cut in front of all of us, shoved his way into line and ordered — a hot dog and a small coke. Everyone in the crowd gave him nasty looks, but he acted as if he'd done nothing wrong. He paid for his food and walked off.

The game was not over. My friend and I finally progressed to the head of the line and ordered our own food. We then walked over to the condiment stand to put ketchup on our hot dogs. Our friend from Whitmore struck again. He literally shoved his way in between my friend and I, mumbling something about needing some ketchup.

It was my turn now. I said to him, "It appears that some of us haven't learned how to wait our turn." He was shocked. His only reply was "Did you say something rude to me?" Me? The rude one? I guess the incredible salary he is earning isn't enough to pay for charm school.

I'm sure the infant daughter he had with him will grow up to be really polite, too; just like her daddy.

Anyway, those are my four fondest UMass memories at this point in time. I'm sure there will be plenty more where that came from. I'll keep you posted. Also, if anyone would like to revive "Graffiti of the Week" as much as I would, please send entries to "Notes from the Campus Center Basement" c/o the Collegian, 113 Campus Center. I'm outta here.

Internships lead to 'real' jobs

People always wonder why they can't get a job after they graduate from college. Experience is all too often the main reason.

When I leave UMass this spring, I know I'll get a job without too much trouble. The reason is that I was able to get some experience under my belt, not because I suffered through a rigorous courseload at a world–class university.

Michael Morrissey

Internships are the best–kept secret of college.

When I talked to my friend Debbie from the Career Center over the summer, I told her what a great time I was having and how much I was learning at my internship. She told me to do her a favor and write a column telling students how essential internships really are.

You can have a high grade point average, be involved in extracrurricular activities and be a great person, but unless you have some internship experience, you could wind up serving fries at McDonald's.

Nobody wants to have a job that you don't get paid for, but after working at the World University Games in Buffalo over the summer, I was sure I wanted to do media relations for the Summer Olympics in Atlanta.

Well, my boss got hired down there and told my friend who worked with me to start typing up his resume. I'm not saying I definitely have the job, but I would have had no chance had I not interned.

Internships don't always have to get you the job or put you in the right direction, either. Sometimes an internship will steer you away from a career you thought you wanted very badly.

During the summer between my sophomore and junior years, I had an internship at a television station in Boston. Being a communication major, I thought I might be interested in working in TV after graduation.

Well, my summer at Channel 56 made me never want to step into a TV station again. I was able to readjust my goals before I was actually hired to do a job I would hate.

If you're an engineering major or in the school of management, it probably isn't necessary to work for small pay and long hours since employers recruit those students. But for the rest of us liberal arts majors, employers aren't going to pound down our doors.

January is a month when people don't even want to leave their houses up in Amherst, but it's the time to start looking around if you haven't already. I was lucky and got my last internship in April, but most employers don't work that way.

The Mather Career Center is a great resource for students, even if it is a million miles from campus. If you start now for a summer internship, you might still have your choice of some great jobs.

Summer isn't the only time for internships, either. You can take a semester in either the fall or spring and intern then. Some people feel that they need to get away from UMass and they benefit from taking a semester off and working.

Co–ops are basically paid internships, and are even better to snag if you can. Generally, you don't get credits for co– ops, so your experience (and the cash) is the main reason to sign up for one.

My final word of advice: you don't have to be a junior or senior to get an internship. In fact, the younger you are, the better it is for yourself and the more internships you might be available to do.

I just hope I get to see my friend Debbie sometime. She said something about working in Atlanta.

The art of losing control

There's a scene in the recent film Shadowlands in which author and highly composed individual C.S. Lewis (played by Anthony Hopkins) gives way to the overwhelming frustration and confusion which surrounds his wife's death and yells at his cohorts, but briefly. He again is consumed by the same pain and falls to tears later in the film. Predictably, these are therapeutic steps for the Lewis character but the lesson underlying the processes is the art of losing control.

Relinquishing the restraints of your mind and body which serve as your physical glue is a delicate task — one which should be approached in moderation, but it's an almost crucial step in readapting to the rapid commotion of moving masses which are UMass.

Please read on, this is not written as an accompaniment to hummus and sprouts while popping garlic pills and arguing with your karma.

I noticed this the first day classes resumed. The overwhelming personal space I had relished over Wintersession had been filled by people, everywhere people. The kinetics of the student bulk to revive initial day of class are too sudden.

Those who roamed the snow–encrusted fields of Charlemont, Mass., Fairport, N.Y. or Salem, Conn. and could look back and see their personal foottracks and no one else's are now instantly faced with the packed and beaten brown ice and pavement which forces baby steps to Herter Hall.

Adam Goulston

Those who stretched their arms for a minute were soon poking the eyes under the brim of a Syracuse lacrosse hat. Those who sped down crunchy country lanes found themselves turning 360s outside Bruegger's after slamming the brakes because some cheesehead turned in front of them with nary a turn of the neck. For some, this is fine and comfy. For others, it's downright stifling — it's a loss of control.

Actively letting others govern and alter your movement is an art, nothing less. More than often, I've snapped. It wasn't a visually stunning thing — more of an internal realization that I'm being robbed or at least borrowed from against my will which manifested itself into a grudge. While it may have been entirely gratifying to deliver a full speed hip check to one of my road blocks and send him flying headfirst into the Citibank table, these would have been Reginald Denny–beating tactics — random and pointless.

Once again I had to slow my pace and accept that my speed, unfortunately is seldom harmonious with the speed of those around me. It's sad that for many, this restriction converts to stress and irritability.

Perhaps there's some good in the fact that being a part of such a densely packed environment is manipulating. It teaches patience. Speeding to the Bursar's Office at Whitmore only to run headlong into a line trailing down the side corridors is at the least discouraging, at the most depressing. Different approaches can be taken.

A day can be ruined and a student can own a scowl and spite. Conversely, a student can wear a grin and a happiness in the knowledge that relinquishing this control of your activity will ultimately be beneficial and lead to a greater amount of freedom.

Have a laugh at the idiocy which has hired two tellers to deal with the financial queries of 200 students. Chuckle at the ineptitude of the town and the state to do anything but polish the layer of ice already on the ground seeing the plows did such a lousy job in the first place. Lay yourself open to the restrictions which will be hurled at you from all sides.

It's a great deal to ask, to passively allow your control to be stripped, but it's a necessary action to cope with UMass. Like C.S. Lewis, an occasional breakdown and surrender of your feelings is alright — it'll all be therapeutic in the long run.

New practice offers holistic dental options

By BRANDEE HELBICK
Collegian Correspondent

It takes more than a cartoon frog in a witch's brew on Saturday morning public service announcements to have healthy teeth and gums. A new dental practice in Amherst has a seemingly new approach to dentistry: holistic dentistry. And it's no joke.

The University Dental Associates offer holistic dentistry as an alternative to traditional dentistry with its drills and fluoride treatments. The question is: "What is holistic dentistry?"

Holistic dentistry takes the patient as a whole into consideration before any treatment is given. For example, a patient on a special diet may not want to receive a fluoride treatment. An alternative to this is using the patient's tooth paste as the cleaning agent.

For another patient, receiving anesthesia by needle may be an issue. No problem at the University Dental Associates, because they offer Transbutaneous Electromyographies. TEMS creates a charge similar to a DC battery which interrupts the normal flow of information from the dental nerves to the brain.

Another alternative is introsedation, which is the practice of using body positioning and tone of voice to relax a tense patient. This in turn increases the pain threshold of the patient.

Within the next three months, the University Dental Associates will be offering yet another alternative in dentistry, dental implants, which are used in place of a bridge synthetic root is implanted into the gum and a crown is placed over it. What will they come up with next?

The University Dental Associates also offers traditional, pediatric and cosmetic dentistry. Their facility can also handle orthodontic and wisdom tooth problems.

The University Dental Associates are not involved with the University of Massachusetts health plan. But they are offering a $15 discount to all students and staff on their initial visit.

There are no back log appointments, so all you need to do is call to make an appointment, take the Sunderland bus one stop outside of Amherst, cross the street and you are at the area's newest dental practice.

Prof. Oates vindicated of plagiarism charge

By DARIENNE HOSLEY
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts history professor accused of plagiarism has been cleared of the charges by the American Historical Association, the Chronicle for Higher Education reported Jan. 5.

However, professor Stephen B. Oates is still unhappy with the AHA's decision, and has threatened to sue the national organization for libel if they do not retract their statement, the Chronicle reported.

Contacted yesterday by the Collegian, Oates said he "is not at liberty" to discuss the situation, and declined further comment.

The AHA's acting executive director, James B. Gardner, told the Collegian he could not comment on the issue. He would not say if the AHA has retracted the decision, or whether Oates has filed a libel suit. The AHA's decision was not released to media.

According to the Chronicle, the AHA wrote in a statement given to Oates and his accusers that they "found no evidence of plagiarism as it is conventionally understood" in the professor's biographies of William Faulkner, Martin Luther King Jr. and Nat Turner.

However, they said that Oates's writings showed "too great and too continuous dependence, even with attribution, on the structure distinctive language, and rhetorical strategies of other scholars and sources."

The Chronicle reported that the statement went on to say that Oates did not clearly distinguish between borrowed language and "widely shared factual material."

In an interview with the Chronicle, Oates said the AHA's decision "doesn't solve anything," and that he and his lawyer asked that the finding be retracted.

If it isn't, he told the Chronicle, "we're going to sue them for libel and conspiracy to commit libel. After they denied me due process all the way through this whole nightmare, I feel the courts are the only place I'll get a fair hearing."

Oates, who teaches the popular courses "American Biography" and "Kennedys Through Film," is not a member of the AHA.

A 1981 recipient of the University's Distinguished Teacher Award, he was first charged of plagiarism in 1990. A professor at Illinois–Wesleyan University charged that Oates lifted material from Benjamin Thomas' 1952 biography, Abraham Lincoln, and used in his own With Malice Toward None: The Life of Abraham Lincoln in 1977 without giving credit where due.

The case was picked up by two scientists at the National Institute of Health, who ran the two texts through a computerized "plagiarism machine" and found more than 175 examples of similar phrasings.

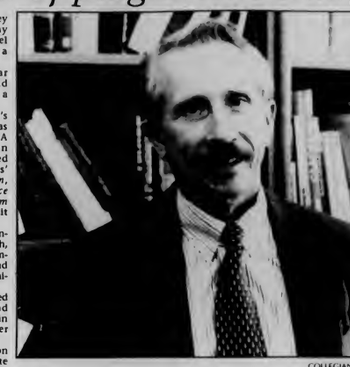
The pair, Walter W. Stewart and Ned Feder, also claimed to have found another 340 instances of plagiarism in Oates' biographies of Martin Luther King Jr. and author William Faulkner.

The American Historical Association joined the Lincoln biography debate and in May 1992 released their decision. While stopping short of the word plagiarism, they said Oates "failed to give Mr. Thomas sufficient attribution for the material he used."

The NIH reassigned Stewart and Feder a year ago, saying their involvement in the Oates case was out of line with their duties.

While the immediate issue is that of Oates' innocence or guilt, the larger issue is that of defining plagiarism. In a May 1993 interview with the Collegian, Oates that Stewart and Feder has "concocted a definition of plagiarism which is so hopelessly restrictive that nothing could be written were that the standard."

According to the Chronicle for Higher Education, the AHA had defined plagiarism as "the expropriation of another author's findings, interpretation, or text, presented thereafter as one's own creation without proper attribution to its actual source."



However, they revised that definition last May to read "expropriation of another author's text, and the presentation of it as one's own."

Roland Sarti, chairman of the history department, said both the AHA's decision and its revised description are too vague to have much impact.

"The AHA has broadened its definition of plagiarism in such a way that it makes it almost impossible to verify or deal with it," he said Wednesday. "You can't really make decisions about it."

The drawn–out discussion has not had a strong effect on the UMass department, or the field as a whole, he said. "We go about our business as best we can," he said.

The AHA has no defined jurisdiction in the case, and its decisions have no legally binding consequences. "It's just a matter of what standards [the AHA] hold up in the area of study," Sarti said.

period and numerous layoffs have been made to accommodate the deficit this year. According to Scott, most of the cut positions will come from faculty and staff retirements or from taking away jobs that need no replacement.

In the areas of student services, staff cuts might be in reductions of services to deaf students, activities planning programs and tutoring services, and less jobs for students.

Cuts in staff positions would affect basic upkeep and maintenance and further program reductions. They could result in cuts of custodial services, delayed physical plant operations and less maintenance.

"We do not want to change the access to the high quality of education that we have here," Scott said. Scott called the cuts a chance to "reshape the institution." He the University will request a raise in funds from the Legislature.

■ Twisters

Twisters is located near several apartment complexes, most notably the Clark House, a residential building for elderly people. In the past these neighbors have complained to the town board that the college students who frequent the establishment cause noise and damages, leading to sleepless nights for those nearby.

At present, Twisters is being overseen by lawyer, David Noonan, who was the litigator when the establishment went into bankruptcy court. It went bankrupt under the previous owner, Mark Forsyth.

The options left open include appealing the decision to Hampshire Superior Court, placing the case before the Bankruptcy Court for final determination, or finding an owner to open a business more conducive to approval.

The ZBA has 90 days to write its decision and file with the town clerk. Within 20 days of filing the appeal can be filed in court.

Miller said he is undecided as to whether or not he will appeal the decision.

Selectman David T. Keenan said he thinks local officials forget that Amherst is a college town and dependent on revenues generated by student business.

Lake profiles new policy

National Security Advisor speaks on world vision

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

SOUTH HADLEY, Mass. — National security adviser Anthony Lake on Wednesday outlined a pragmatic vision of a post-Cold War foreign policy driven largely by this country's economic needs.

Speaking to an audience of 600 students, faculty and other at Mount Holyoke College, Lake defined the world not only in socio-political terms, but as "customers, clients, bosses and partners."

He justified the promotion of democracy in large part for its domestic economic benefits. "For democracies tend not to fight one another. They make better partners in trade and diplomacy," he said

In his State of the Union address Tuesday, President Clinton laid great weight on domestic issues like the reform of health care and welfare, fighting crime, and job retraining.

But, speaking at a student awards ceremony in Abbey Memorial Chapel, Lake said the Clinton administration also has secured American jobs in the North American Free Trade Agreement, the world trade talks known as GATT, and in negotiations with Japan.

As the first strategic goal of American foreign policy, Lake called for opening new world markets to this country's goods and services. "We are the world's engine of economic growth," he said.

The bespectacled Lake, dressed in academic gown, also urged adapting security policies to increasing threats like terrorism and regional powers and pressing for more democracy around the world.

Speaking to reporters after his 25-minute address, Lake defended the president's often-criticized foreign policies.

"He in many ways is ahead of the rest of us. . . in thinking that you cannot make the old distinctions between domestic and foreign policy. . . especially on economic issues," Lake said.

Lake, 54, took a leave from his position as professor of international relations at Mount Holyoke one year ago to serve as national security adviser. He was returning to the college for the first time on his two-day visit that began Wednesday.

U.S. plans to arm S. Korea

By ROBERT BURNS
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon is planning to send Patriot air defense missiles to South Korea as "sensible, rational defense preparations" for a potential North Korean Scud rocket assault, a senior official said Wednesday.

The move seemed likely to raise the level of tension on the Korean peninsula, where a million-man North Korean army stands just across the border from a South Korean force bolstered by 36,000 U.S. Army and Air Force troops.

Tensions have been inflamed in recent months by a standoff between Washington and Pyongyang over international inspections of the communist nation's nuclear program, which the United States says is covertly pursuing nuclear bombs. North Korea denies its nuclear facilities have any military purpose.

Frank Wisner, the undersecretary of defense for policy, told reporters at a breakfast meeting the Patriot deployment would go ahead, although he said no final decision had been made and details such as timing had not been set.

"We will proceed with the deployment," Wisner said. "It doesn't mean we're proceeding with it on a crash basis, that they have to be out there tomorrow."

Later, the Pentagon press secretary, Kathleen deLaski said Wisner "didn't mean to say that in the present tense," and meant instead to highlight the fact that Clinton had not yet given the go-ahead for the Patriots.

White House press secretary Dee Dee Myers said, "The only thing we can say is it's moving in that direction, but the operational decisions have not been made."

At the North Korean mission to the united Nations in New York, an aide said Ambassador Ho Jong was not available to comment on the Patriot plan. Ho has been heading his government's side in nuclear inspection talks with Washington.

The Patriot, originally designed as a replacement for nuclear-tipped anti-aircraft missiles in Europe, was used in the 1991 Persian Gulf War to defend Saudi Arabia, israel and parts of Turkey against Iraqi Scud missile attacks.

The Patriot's Gulf War performance initially was hailed by the Pentagon as an unqualified success, but later inquiries raised doubt about whether it actually intercepted any of the Scud missiles launched by Saddam Hussein's forces.

Wisner said the request for Patriots came from Gen. Gary Luck, commander of the U.S. forces in Korea. There currentiy are no anti-missile defense systems in the south.

Wisner said a Patriot deployment in Korea had been under consideration "for some time" as part of a broader assessment of evoiving defense requirement there.

"Gen. Luck has come back and asked for it now, and we will proceed with the deployment," Wisner said.

In South Korea the Patriot would provide some measure of protection against North Korean Scud rocket attacks on ports and military installations, but it would be much less than a complete solution to a Scud attack on Seoul, the south's capital.

Wisner stressed that Patriots are defensive weapons and do not pose a threat to North Korea.

Court reverses sniper's conviction

By JONATHAN YENKIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — A man who shot his wife to death and then fired on Boston neighborhoods from a small airplane succeeded Wednesday in overturning his murder conviction.

The state Supreme Judicial Court set aside the 1992 guilty verdict against Alfred J. Hunter, ruling that a judge made a critical error by not conducting a hearing to see whether certain incriminating testimony could be admitted. The case was sent back to Superior Court.

Hunter, 46, had been convicted of murdering his estranged wife, Elvira, by shooting her eight times at her Danvers home on May 9, 1989, as their 5-year-old son looked on.

After the killing, authorities said, Hunter stole a car at gunpoint and drove to an airport in Beverly, where he commandeered a small airplane. He then flew the plane over Boston, buzzing several neighborhoods and Logan international Airport while firing an assault rifle. Nobody was injured in that shooting spree.

Hunter never disputed that he killed his wife, but he claimed he was mentally ill.

But during the trial, the judge allowed the jury to hear testimony from two men who had been held in custody with Hunter after his arrest. Both men testified that Hunter said he killed his wife because he was angry. One testified that Hunter claimed his wife had cheated on him.

Hunter's defense attorney argued that the statements should be disqualified because Hunter was not mentally competent at the time. A month after Hunter made those statements, he was found incompetent to stand trial.

He was later found competent to stand trial in 1990.

The state Supreme Judicial Court ruled that the judge should have conducted a hearing to determine whether the statements were voluntary.

"The sole issue at trial concerned Hunter's state of mind at the time of the killing," the court said in its unanimous opinion.

"The jury may have concluded from Hunter's statements that he was in control of what he was in control of what he was doing at the time of the killing and that Hunter had planned to kill his wife," the court said.

Prison punishments overturned

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Supreme Judicial Court ruled Thursday that the state's Department of Correction wrongly sentenced two inmates to 30 days in solitary confinement for wearing African National Congress necklaces.

The prisoners said their constitutional rights were violated when they were punished in 1990 for refusing to take off their medallions, which they said represented pride in their African heritage and support of the ANC's efforts to rid South Africa of its apartheid policies.

The high court ruled that the department's disciplinary board erred because its list of prohibited attire did not mention jewelry. But the SJC did not address the broader question of whether the constitutional rights of William Manor and Joseph Matz were violated.

"We're pleased that the court has ruled that it was improper for the department to punish these prisoners as the Department of Correction did," said the inmates' lawyer, Scott P. Lewis.

"We had hoped the court would reach the underlying constitutional question on the rights of prisoners to express their political views," Lewis said.

On May 22, 1990, correctional officer Sgt. Paul Gordon, stopped Manor while he was on his way to the prison cafeteria at MCI Cedar Junction in Walpole. He told Manor that his handmade necklace — a piece of leather cut in the shape of Africa, hanging around his neck on a shoelace — was "contraband" and ordered him to remove it.

Manor refused, and was charged with several disciplinary infractions, including disobeying an order and "attempting to participate in an unauthorized group activity."

Manor was found guilty by a disciplinary board and, his appeal denied, sentenced to 30 days in isolation, the maximum amount of solitary time allowed for punishment.

A Superior Court judge ruled that guidelines on jewelry don't include ANC paraphernalia.

Counting Crows tally high score

Counting Crows
Pearl St.
January 24, 1994

There are two really easy ways to judge the quality of any live show. The first is how many times the band/musician you are watching hits a groove or a note that brings an irrepressible grin to your face, and the second is how badly you want to hear the music again after the show is over. Well, Monday night at Pearl St. I think I grinned until my face hurt, and as the Counting Crows played their final note, I could not wait to hear those songs again.

The Crows were recently voted the best new band in Rolling Stone's Critics Poll, and showed a packed house why on Monday night. The band's sound lends itself to many Crows were recently voted Best New Band in comparisons, and they do recall, at some points, early REM, Van Morrison, even Neil Young. but they come away with their own, un-grungy, fresh take on music.

Powered by thick rhythms, a constantly shifting guitar sound, and the deep foundations of a Hammond organ, they played almost two hours and held the crowd at complete attention as slow and urgent ballads lead to full throttle rockers, and then back again. The band was both tight and creative, showing an ability to jam without sounding sloppy.

The focus of the stage, however, was lead singer Adam Duritz, dreadlocked and bedecked in a KISS t-shirt. He held the audience captive, and conveyed unabashed honesty through his incredible singing, as he writhed and twisted with each note he sang. Certainly he is one of, if not the best new singers today, and he displayed enthusiasm and emotion openly.

The sellout crowd at Pearl St. seemed to understand that they were seeing something special, and, for once, nobody crowd-surfed or moshed (even during their hit "Mr. Jones"). Heads bobbed, people swayed and loved the music, and when they played their last song, a quiet acoustic version of the Psychedelic furs "Ghost In You", you could almost hear the audience let out a collective breath as they realized they had just seen the best new band of 1994.

Wow. Now I am going to go buy the album and clear a place on my CD player for a while...

August and Everything After Geffen Records

In the past year or so, dozens of new bands have burst into rock music's spotlight: Blind Melon, Gin Blossoms, The Breeders, and Porno for Pyros, just to name a few. Well, if you're going to talk about fresh new bands, you'd better start discussing San Francisco's Counting Crows, perhaps the best new band of them all.

It's difficult to label Counting Corws' music as having a certain "sound." The 11 tracks on the album are quite diverse, ranging from upbeat rockers like "Mr. Jones," "Rain King," and "A Murder of One" to somber ballads such as "Raining in Baltimore" and "Ghost Train."

One constant throughout the entire album, however, is the excellence in both music and lyrics. Vocalist Adam Duritz pours his soui into each tune, creating a very emotional collection of songs. The frustration of life in "Round Here," the mixed emotions of "Anna Begins," the glowing self- confidence in "Rain King"— all of these feelings are expressed loud and clear.

The best song on the album, and maybe one of the best songs of the year, is "Mr. Jones." This fast-paced number showcases both the songwriting skiil and the vocal abiiity of Duritz, who wrote the entire album. In "Mr. Jones," serious moods combine with witty lyrics and dialogue to create a brilliant and stirring song about identity and wishes of stardom and success.

Another impressive rocker is "A Murder of One," an inspirational plea to a friend to get her life together. While singing to a specific character here, Duritz manages to motivate the listener as well. When he cries, "You don't want to waste your lifel," the message is taken to heart.

While Duritz and the band prove with these two songs, as well as with "Rain King," that they have the abiiiy to tear things up, most of the album is composed of slower songs. Among the best of these is "Anna Begins," a story about the trauma of love. Other notable tunes are "Round Here," "Sullivan Street," and "Rainlng in Baltimore," all of which are performed with tangible feeling by the band.

The stories told by each song on the album seem intensely real, which makes listening to the entire album quite a draining experience. Duritz has such

Friends of FAC hold gala

There was "Much Ado About Something" at the Lord Jeffrey Inn Saturday night, thanks to the Friends' of the Fine Arts Center Sixth Annual Gala.

The gala is usually composed of friends and businesses of the Valley who don sharp threads and dancing shoes to show their support for the UMass Fine Arts Center.

This event traditionally draws a majority of Amherst residents, and exemplifies a mutually beneficial relationship between the university and town.

"There is tremendous support," explained Alice Coco, the gala chair. Coco also said that the gala usually appeals to "a spectrum of people in the valley."

Supporters not only attend the cabaret-style events, dinner and dancing happening between, but lend to the evening's activities by participating in two auctions; a live and a silent one.

The silent auction was conducted on an ongoing basis throughout the evening, with bids for various items written on a circulating piece of paper which was closed at 10:30 p.m. Some of the donations include jewelry from Sutters Mill, Northampton, prints from the R. Michelson Gallery, Amherst, a skydive from Airborne Adventures Skydiving School, gift certificates from Cafe DiCarlo, Southampton Antiques and many others. This year, all proceeds from the auction and other gala events will go towards the renovation of the F.A.C. lobby.

REBECCA PETERSON/COLLEGIAN

A friend of the F.A.C. participates in the silent auction.

"There is a responsiveness in the community for making sure that there is a Fine Arts Center and that these types of activities are available to all of us," said Coco.

Coco emphasized the high quality programming which she feels demonstrates a "cultural commitment to the community." She added that the F.A.C. offers students exposure to "things you would never [otherwise] see."

"A student would be hard-pressed to say there's nothing going on here," she added, citing excellent performances by the UMass Music Department to theater productions of Broadway caliber which contribute to the success of the F.A.C.

The success of the gala was evident by the joy-laden faces of its guests.

"We're having a wonderful time – it's a bonanza," said Sandy Hill, a professor of Engineering at UMass. "We get to dress up, that's nice too," he added.

Amidst the happy glow of smiling gala-goers, F.A.C. Director Fred Tillis' contentment could be attributed to the overwhelming support shown by his peers.

"We have a lot of people who love the university," said Tillis. "Our idea is that the arts are the important part," he added, explaining that art enables us to communicate as individuals on a much broader level.

Both Coco and Tillis welcome all students to take advantage of the upcoming programs to be presented in the F.A.C. For more information on upcoming shows, call the Box Office at 545-2511.

Top to bottom, August and Everything After is one great album. While the initial hook is provided by the faster pieces, the slower songs quickly begin to grow on the listener as well. After hearing Counting Crows' debut, one can only hope that a sophomore effort will soon be in the works.

Esquivel's novel features food, fun & romance

BY AMY S. BURNS
Collegian Staff

Like Water For Chocolate
Laura Esquivel
Doubleday

In Laura Esquivel's novel Like Water For Chocolate each chapter is a recipe and a story. Food plays an important role throughout the book, and is sometimes a more active character than the heroine. Tita, in fact Tita's love affair with the kitchen often overshadows her long suffering romance with her brother–in–law, Pedro.

Reading this novel allows us to enter a world where ghosts and supernatural events are simply ordinary occurrences, and where a meal can dramatically alter life. Tita doesn't bat an eyelash at the sight of numerous ghosts. It doesn't seem to surprise anyone that an unusual ingredient in a dish can immediately change the mood of everyone who eats it.

Esquivel doesn't bother to disguise bizarre events as simple chance. This is especially nice, since romances often rely to heavily upon coincidences to arrive at their happy endings. In Like Water For Chocolate magic happens, and Esquivel doesn't bother to try to pass it off as reality.

Though this fairy tale style may appear childish on the surface, the mystical events in the story can be seen as metaphors that magnify the thoughts and feelings of the characters.

The best thing about this novel is the food. Cooking is really the root of everything that happens in the book. It is the only means through which Tita can change her life. Both her love and her anguish are reflected in the meals she prepares.

Because she is the youngest daughter, Tita is forced to stay at home and take are of her mother until she dies. However through cooking she can partially change her fate, she can make people sick or make them fall in love. Through food Tita is actually able to have some amount of power.

This novel is certainly not a modern day love story, Tita is not an independent woman with a career. In fact the man she passionately loves does not even treat her as an equal. Instead this story echoes the idea that "true love" never dies as seen in The Princess Bride. The love between Tita and Pedro is something that neither of them can control, even when it makes more sense to forget about each other.

The bad part about this book is that it is essentially predictable. There are no huge surprises. I was also annoyed that Tita was a typical passive female character, who puts up with Pedro even though he has the nerve to marry her own sister.

I would have to say that my own personal heroine in the book was Tita's sister, Gertrudis who escapes their mother's tyrannical rule by running off, completely naked, with a rebel soldier. Though it may not sound like it, Gertrudis actually makes a better life for herself, while Tita just waits for one to come along.

COURTESY DOUBLEDAY BOOKS

Laura Esquivel's bestselling romance, Like Water For Chocolate.

Even though I wished Tita could have been less passive, I really loved that she was able to affect things with her cooking. It seemed like a truly practical way for a woman in turn–of–the–century Mexico to quietly steal some power for herself. I would definitely recommend this book. Esquivel gives us a unique look at life through food.

Russian reformer resigns

Finance minister frustrated by backward movement

By DEBORAH SEWARD
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Russia's outgoing finance minister denounced President Boris Yeltsin's government Wednesday as "red managers" who could provoke economic collapse and social unrest by reviving a Soviet–style economy.

Boris Fyodorov rejected President Boris Yeltsin's offer that he stay on as finance minister in a Cabinet now dominated by former industrial bosses, central planners and collective farm directors.

Fyodorov said the new Cabinet's policies were "leading to a dead end at the expense of the people's pocket. . . The threat of a social explosion is moving from the sphere of theory into the sphere of reality."

His departure strengthened the hand of Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin, who has promised massive subsidies for agriculture and called for huge investments in industry.

"Boris Nikolayevich, the country has had an economic coup, a turn back. Our only hope is you!" Fyodorov said in an impassioned statement issued after meeting with Yeltsin at the Kremlin.

Yeltsin has gone along with the growing influence of Chernomyrdin, a former head of the Soviet natural gas industry.

Chernomyrdin successfully protected Central Bank Chairman Viktor Gerashchenko and Deputy Prime Minister Alexander Zaveryukha, who Fyodorov blames for inflationary government subsidies to inefficient state farms and factories. Fyodorov had demanded their removal and asked to be named a deputy prime minister so he would not be outranked by Zaveryukha.

Yeltsin named Fyodorov's deputy, Sergei Dubinin, acting finance minister. The interfax news agency quoted Fyodorov as saying his successor wasn't a fighter.

Fyodorov was respected by Western bankers and considered the most important reformer left in the government. He remains a deputy in the lower house of parliament.

Fyodorov said he could not accept the domination "of the lifeless and illiterate ideology" of "red economic managers, which in a market economy inevitably dooms the country to collapse and the people to a fall in living standards."

He said Russia now faces soaring inflation, a dollar exchange rate of more than 10,000 rubles, devaluation of savings, shortages, increasing capital flight and isolation from world markets.

The dismantling of the reform team Yeltsin assembles after the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991 came after anti– reform nationalists and Communists made a strong showing in the Dec. 12 parliamentary vote.

Even though reformers fared badly in the election, Yeltsin vowed to hold firm to the reform course. In fact he has retreated, giving Chernomyrdin a greater say in economic policy.

The prime minister's job is potentially a powerful political springboard. Under the new Russian constitution, Chernomyrdin would succeed Yeltsin if the president were unable to fulfill his duties.

Town pushes for hate crime law

By ANNE THOMPSON
Associated Press

BOSTON — Swastikas and racist graffiti spray painted on a hardware store were enough for a small city council to pass a hate crime ordinance unlike any other in the country.

Marlboro city officials want people convicted of hate crimes to be fined $300 and permanently lose city services such as library cards, fishing licenses, and trash collection.

Civil rights attorneys said the Marlboro ordinance may be too extreme to become law. Hate crime legislation is tricky because it can overlap kinds of self–expression protected by the First Amendment.

Still, the Anti–Defamation League applauded the city for taking a stand.

"I fear it may tread on rights otherwise protected," said Sally Greenberg, legal counsel for the New England branch of the Anti–Defamation League. "But what they've done is make a strong statement. I think that's entirely appropriate."

Michael Liberman, national counsel for the ADL, said while cities such as Chicago and St. Louis have laws specifically against hate crime, this is the first attempt he knows of to revoke city services as punishment.

The ordinance was approved unanimously Tuesday by the 11 member city council and goes next to Marlboro's city attorney to make sure it does not conflict with state or federal laws. The mayor would then have 10 days to approve it.

Councilor at Large James Agoritsas said he drafted the ordinance because the rising incidence of hate crimes has become a community problem.

The ADL announced this week there were 189 anti–Semitic incidents in Massachusetts last year, an increase of 40 percent over 1992. Around the country that figure increased 7 percent to 1,867.

"We've become a nation of hand–wringers," said Agoritsas, an attorney. "We sit here and say there's nothing we can do. I say hogwash. We cannot rely on the state and the federal government to legislate against crime."

Most hate crime cases are prosecuted under state statutes. Only four states – Alaska, Nebraska, Utah, and Wyoming – do not have human or civil rights legislation that covers hate crimes.

the separate sports section," said Jamey Moeser, a junior bio–chemistry and math major.

Sara Finn, sophomore engineering major, said she liked the smaller–sized paper better. "I think the smaller ones are easier to flip through and carry," she said.

Denise Sadler, a senior English major, said she felt the new size makes it look more professional but she prefers the smaller Collegian. "First of all, it doesn't fit in my bag easily anymore. Second of all, it is harder to read in class to hide from your professor," she said.

"I confess I would have liked it to have more pages and been the original size. Before it was a nice little size that would fit in my notebook. The new size is nice, but I like the old size better," said Ramsey Kurdi, a senior bachelor of music major.

Karen Dorsey, a senior math major also said she liked the smaller Collegian better. "It is easier to put on my desk and put in my bag. The new size looks nice, but it takes up to much room," she said.

Susan Holdsworth, a sophomore communications major said she likes the new paper because there is more information within it.

"I definitely think you should continue having broadsheet. A bigger size means more information and more national coverage," she said.

"I like the new one better. I was sick of the old paper. Plus, there is more room in the new paper for more editorials," said Matt Battaglia, a junior political science major.

Deanna Welker, a graduate student in public health, said she thinks the paper looks great, but personally would like the smaller size because it is easier to handle.

"I really like the new size because you don't even have to hold the paper, you can just read it over someone else shoulders," said Neil Carpenter, a junior finance major.

Richard Toomey, an intern working for the admissions office, said the Collegian now looks more professional. "It looks great. It comes across like it should. I think it is a great size to have," he said.

Violence in Bosnia on increase

By MAUD S. BEELMAN
Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Bosnia– Herzegovina – Civilians mobbed a U.N. food convoy and wounded six of its Bosnian police escorts Wednesday, in a grim demonstration of escalating lawlessness driven by hunger and desperation.

The officers suffered bullet wounds in the attack on the 10–truck convoy as it entered Ticici, a Muslim village near Kakanj, 30 miles northwest of Sarajevo, where about 200 civilians waited for it, U.N. officials said.

"Somebody opened fire at the escort from the window of a house," said Kris Janowski, a U.N. spokesperson in Sarajevo.

The six policemen were being treated in a hospital. Janowski said aid convoys along the route were suspended — a move that would affect Kakanj, Visoko and Tuzla, the Muslim–led government's biggest stronghold outside of Sarajevo.

"Obviously, it is a very serious problem in an area where we already have serious problems," Janowski said. Even before the attacks at Ticici, only about 21 percent of intended aid supplies for that area were getting through, he said.

It was the second attack at Ticici in two days. On Tuesday, hundreds of villagers mobbed another convoy and beat Bosnian government police officers escorting the trucks after they fired warning shots in the air. One suffered leg wounds in return fire from the crowd.

Janowski said the trucks were allowed to proceed Tuesday only after some cargo was looted.

Prince Charles unfazed by shots

By GEOFF SPENCER
Associated Press

SYDNEY, Australia — Britain's Prince Charles, eager to boost his image after the breakup of his marriage to Princess Diana, has proved one thing: he can stay cool under fire.

The 45-year-old heir to the throne hardly flinched Wednesday when a young man ran out of a crowd, lunged at him and fired two blank shots from a starter's pistol during an outdoor ceremony marking Australia's national day.

The prince saw the man run toward him and froze momentarily as the shots rang out. Afterward, he calmly adjusted his cuff links.

Within minutes of his assailant's arrest, Charles carried on with his speech. He joked with the crowd, and later assured guests at a cocktail party that he was fine.

Police said the assailant, 23-year-old university student David Kang, wrote Prince Charles last month to complain about Australia's treatment of several hundred Cambodian boat people held in detention camps.

The prince's staff had written back that Charles could not become involved in the matter.

Kang was jailed and charged under a federal law to protect international VIPs. If convicted, he could be imprisoned for a maximum of 20 years.

He is scheduled to appear in court early Thursday.

The prince did not comment to reporters. His aides said he was unconcerned about his safety and would continue his tour of Australia.

New South Wales state Police Minister Terry Griffiths described the attack as a "stunt, not an assassination attempt."

"There was no risk to the prince's physical being at any stage," he said.

Griffiths criticized Buckingham Palace for insisting on low-level protection so the prince could be close to the public. The palace's instructions were "that there are to be no security forces between the prince and the public," he said.

More snow to hit the area Friday

Sleet, freezing rain will keep road icy and slippery

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

Bitter cold hit Massachusetts on Wednesday following a morning snow storm that clobbered Cape Cod the hardest but snarled morning commutes and closed schools in other regions as well.

And the National Weather Service had bad news for Friday morning, snow possibly changing to sleet, freezing rain or all rain, depending on the region and the temperatures.

Dr. Richard Aghababian, interim chairman of emergency medicine at the University of Massachusetts Medical Center at Worcester said snow-covered ice was resulting in broken bones, especially for the elderly.

Aghababian and the American Automobile Association of Massachusetts also warned motorists to hold down their speed and keep safe distances between cars.

School districts were watching the weather reports carefully as many came close to using up the snow days they had built into their calendars.

The state requires public schools to be open for at least 180 days, so those using up all their snow days could have to stay open into the summer to make up lost time.

Wednesday's snow deposited four to six inches of snow on Cape Cod and snow squalls forecast there for Wednesday night could add to that total.

Temperatures generally were in the single numbers or teens in the state during the day and dropped as darkness fell.

Snow was expected to develop across the state during the early morning Friday and then switch to a mix of sleet and freezing rain on Friday morning in most areas. in eastern Massachusetts it could change to all rain by midday Friday.

"It is too early to pin down expected snowfall or ice accumulations for this storm. But the potential exists for a significant amount of icing," the weather service said.

Aghababian said the ice already on the ground is proving dangerous.

"What we are seeing is a lot of the old people dropping," he said.

Aghababian suggested that people walk in groups and support each other when the surface is icy and wear boots with safer rubber soles.

Motorists also need to be careful, he said. "They are not leaving enough margin of safety between their cars," he said.

The American Automobile Association suggested common sense, such as reducing speed and using headlights in daytime snow and sleet storms.

Help emerges as residents lend a hand

By CONNIE CASS
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — The call went out by telephone and TV and computer. Help us! Volunteers answered with a flood of food, blankets and, most of all, themselves.

Now, with federal disaster aid taking hold, the nation's attention is turning elsewhere, but relief agencies say they still need people with high compassion quotients, like the ones who responded in the first days following the death– dealing Northridge earthquake.

Dr. Ebenezer Chambi brought daily care and free medicine to coughing, wheezing children sleeping in tents because the Jan. 17 quake had ruined their homes. More doctors are needed.

"I don't feel myself a volunteer, I feel myself a part of the team," said Chambi, who worked out of a Seventh–day Adventist medical van.

Jane Kubrian of Encino passed out donated clothing under a red–and–white tent, feeling frustrated she couldn't speak Spanish with quake victims with Central America. interpreters are needed.

"I wish i could talk to the children more," Kubrian said. "But I hug them and hope that makes them feel better."

A Malibu couple, Cheri and Marty Villaire, saw television pictures of a woman and her newborn baby camping under sheets of plastic. They searched two parks and a hospital, handing out toys and clothes as they went, before finding the mother and child sleeping outdoors. Such determined people are needed.

"You just don't leave a mother and a baby stranded like that," said Cheri Villaire, who gave the woman $100.

Sally Holland, a Salvation Army volunteer from San Jose, posted a plea for volunteers Tuesday through the America Online computer network. She's been receiving 50 responses a day. Such innovative people are needed.

"It's the wave of the future, I think, to organize disaster work," Holland said.

The most sought–after volunteers are medical personnel, people trained to run shelters or fill out aid requests, people with clerical skills, and truck drivers and loaders.

The most needed donations are baby items, especially diapers, formula and Pedialyte, a drink that helps rehydrate babies who suffer diarrhea, said Theresa Adams Lopez, who coordinates volunteers for Los Angeles.

Also in short supply are blankets and, for people salvaging belongings from damaged properties, cardboard boxes and packing tape. The Salvation Army is accepting clothing, but most relief agencies say donated clothing isn't the best use of a donor's resources — it costs precious dollars to ship and needs to be size–sorted by volunteers.

Money, of course, is the most practical donation. The Red Cross asks Americans to give to local chapters, with donations earmarked for quake relief. Some grants will help people buy their own replacement clothes and appliances.

More than 4,000 trained Red Cross volunteers have poured in, more than a third from outside California. The city volunteer office has registered 200 people per day, and 500 on Sunday.

And the private Los Angeles Volunteerism Project, a standing organization that usually coordinates the flow of volunteers in non–disaster times, has referred more than 700 people to relief agencies, said director Pat Paolilli.

"People respond to an urgent request when you put out a call," Paolilli said. "But we don't want people to forget there will be an ongoing need here."

"Crack the whip!"

Your Horoscope
By Joan Dow

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Unexpected changes and fluctuating business fortunes could leave you feeling angry or perplexed. Consult experts about streamlining your operation. Romantic vibrations are on the rise; go for it!

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): Others depend on you to see them through difficult times. Refuse to be distracted by office politics; concentrate on working and learning. Love may be blind.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): Learn to stand on your own two feet and make firm decisions. A real estate or accounting class could lead to new career goals. Help a friend or relative going through a crisis.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): The emphasis now is on sticking to the straight and narrow. This is no time to waver to go back on your word.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Look for ways to improve your earning potential. Enhance your mental talents and become a skilled speaker or writer. A telephone call or letter sets your pulse racing. Put on the brakes!

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Be prepared to assume new responsibilities; those in authority will show you greater respect. Heed your humanitarian instincts and give aid to the needy. Buy a few books for our home library.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Research projects and literary endeavors get the green light. A willingness to compromise helps you salvage a close relationship. The time is right for big business and bold moves. Forge ahead.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Use your considerable will power to reach lofty aims and gain new respect from influential people. New sights and associations give you valuable insights. Put more pizzazz in your social life. Issue invitations.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): Success comes when you show greater flexibility. Put a legal matter on hold. The ability to speak a second language opens new business doors. Make the most of your resources. Emphasize spiritual growth.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): Hopes raised early in the day could be dashed unless you proceed with caution. Stay away from people who sap your energy.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Reinforce your reputation as a savvy executive. Apply your managerial talents in business or the arts. Spiritual rewards bring greater satisfaction than new financial gains.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Thoughts of the unknown dominate today. The true meaning of life is uppermost in your mind. Business activity is brisk and involves high stakes.

this time beating Arcidiacano to give UMass a 3–1 lead.

Freshman center Chris Mikuia cut the Minuteman lead to one, as Kilduff misplayed his weak wrist shot.

"David has been struggling a little bit lately," said Mallen. "We have a lot of faith in David Kilduff and we're just glad he came out and got a win for us tonight."

UMass special teams shined again, this time short–handed as Wagar slid a pretty pass by a sprawling Yellow Jacket defenseman to Bonneau who flipped into the top corner, opening the flood gates.

The Minutemen led by two goals from Warren Norris scored six more unanswered goals as they cruised to an easy victory. The win improves UMass' record to 14–7, while A.I.C. falls to 8–7. The Minuteman travel to Army to play the Cadets Saturday night.

that if you get one, you go for two. If you get two, you go for three. You don't sit back. It's a hard thing to do but it's a psychological advantage."

And so before the third period began, the team knew they would again be victorious at the William D. Mullins Center, as they have 10 times before. They played UMass hockey in the third period, and finished the game with a toughness that was lacking in a few of their blowout losses.

"Up in Alaska, we got it dished out to us," said Bonneau. "We just tried to give them a lesson and dish it out the other way. That's the key to success. You have to kill teams, you have to put them away."

While players like Norris admitted that they don't go out and try to kill Division II and III opponents, the Minutemen do want one thing recognized: while they may not be able to play at the level of the nation's top teams yet, they are learning to play with pride and a killer instinct.

MATT KAHN/COLLEGIAN

The UMass hockey team is trying to find a killer instinct like the one Brett Wagar demonstrated in Tuesday night's win over American International College. Wagar registered a hat trick against the Yellow Jackets.

that you don't accept your role on the team and all of a sudden the team starts to disintegrate. That seems to be what happened to us. But I think we're going to be O.K.," said Calipari.

"One thing this team knows how to do is win. They know how to figure ways, even when we're playing bad, to figure how to be in the game late so you have the chance to make the game–winning shot, and we did that against GW."

■ Minutewomen

Dukes outscored UMass 12–6 to pull to within one at 48–47 with 8:09 remaining, but that was as close as Duquesne was going to get.

From that points, the Minutewomen outscored the Lady dukes 16–6 for the 64–53 final. During the final run, Thomas and Kuzmeski led UMass with four and eight points, respectively.

Gurtle (11 points) and Kuzmeski (10 points) also were in double figures for UMass.

Celtics 103, Heat 98

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Celtics extended their season-best winning streak to six games Wednesday night, surviving a desperation comeback for a 103-98 victory over the Miami Heat.

The Celtics led 99-87 before baskets by Glen Rice, Rony Seikaly and Matt Geiger made it 99-93 with 24 seconds left. Geiger's dunk made it 100-95 with 14 seconds remaining.

Dee Brown hit a free throw for Boston, and Miami's last hope vanished when Brian Shaw's 3-pointer fell short with 7.0 seconds remaining. After a layup by Boston's Sherman Douglas, Geiger hit a 3-pointer at the buzzer.

Dino Radja led Boston with 23 points, Brown added 14 and Xavier McDaniel 13.

Miami was led by Seikaly with 23 points and 15 rebounds, and Geiger with 20 points.

No. 3 Kansas 62, Oklahoma St. 61

LAWRENCE, Kan. (AP) — Steve Woodberry hit a 3-pointer with 1.5 seconds left in overtime, giving No. 3 Kansas a 62-61 victory over Oklahoma State Wednesday night.

Fred Burley made one foul shot with 10.4 seconds left, putting Oklahoma State ahead 61-59. He missed the second free throw and Kansas' Greg Ostertag rebounded.

Woodberry stepped up on the right side of the 3-point line and swished the game-winner. He led Kansas (18-2, 3-1 Big Eight) with 17 points.

Ostertag had nine points, 11 rebounds and eight blocked shots. Sean Pearson scored 15 for Kansas.

Brooks Thompson scored 23 and Randy Rutherford had 15 for Oklahoma State. Bryant Reeves scored 13 points and had nine rebounds for the Cowboys (13-6, 2-2).

Minutemen to face hungry Bearcats

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

It is smart to stay out of a tiger's den when it hasn't eaten for a while, has been tazed a few times and is on the prowl.

Similarly, the Shoemaker Center will not be a safe place for No. 8 Massachusetts as the Minutemen walk into the home of the Cincinnati Bearcats, who lost for the first time at the Shoe in 25 tries earlier this season against Alabama-Birmingham. That's some food for thought.

In addition, Coach Bob Huggins' Cats dropped out of the Top 25 for the first time in two years after dropping its last two road decisions at Xavier (82–76) and at Memphis State (62–55), also making it the first time since 1991 that UC has lost consecutive games. For a team that was ranked as high as third in the pre-season polls, it is safe to say that Cincinnati (12–5) has been stunned.

Massachusetts is coming in off a last-second, thrilling dunk–for–the–win by Marcus Camby, which downed Atlantic 10 rival George Washington, 56–55, last Saturday in the William D. Mullins Center. The last time the Minutemen hit the road, however, Coach John Calipari and company came back to Amherst with their first defeat in eleven tries; Great Midwest member De Paul, who is a conference rival of UC, rode a 29–point performance by senior Tom Kleinschmidt to bury the Massachusetts winning streak.

Huggins and Calipari are two of the hottest and most successful young coaches in America, and they as well as their teams will match wits for the second season in a row. Last season in the Springfield Civic Center, Nick Van Exel lit up the Minutemen, scoring 27 points while leading the Bearcats to a 64–53 victory over Massachusetts. Van Exel has since departed via the NBA Draft to the Los Angeles Lakers, but Cincinnati still possesses a bomber from the outside. His name: LaZelle Durden, the leading scorer for the Bearcats.

Durden is not afraid to pull the trigger from behind the three–point arc; the 6–foot–2 junior guard has already attempted 97 3–pt. FGs, making 45 of them, including three contests this season in which he made eight, his career high. One of these games was against Massachusetts' A–10 foe, Temple; Durden tallied 26 points in a losing effort.

He is averaging 19.4 points, 2.8 rebounds and 1.5 assists per game for Cincinnati. Another young gun for the Bearcats is Dontonio Wingfield, who is one of the five best freshmen in the country, according to Calipari. Wingfield was forced to sit out the Cats' last game because of skipping class, but he should be ready to play tonight against the Minutemen.

Wingfield has been in double digits in scoring in all but two of Cincinnati's contests, including the loss at Xavier. He is also a force on the glass, averaging 11 rebounds over his last four games. The 6–foot–8, 256–pounder from Georgia is obviously a key for the Bearcats, along with 6–foot–5 jumping–jack Curtis Bostic, who will challenge one of the best offensive rebounding frontlines in the country in Massachusetts.

A key for the Minutemen will be the play of sophomore forwards Donta Bright and Dana Dingle, who have both proven so far this season that they can slice in the lane to score or pick up garbage hoops by playing tough, hard–nosed defense on one end and crashing the boards on the other.

Both Bright and Dingle are averaging over nine points a game and six rebounds a contest. Bright made the key pass to Camby in Massachusetts' win over GW, gathering up a loose ball and firing a bullet for the dunk and the victory.

Calipari said his team's success is distribution of the ball and making the extra pass. Massachusetts is at a point right now that everyone is gunning for the Minutemen and they are wearing a huge target on their backs.

Minutewomen fall to GW Colonials

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team lost its lead with 15:39 to go in the second half, and failed to regain it as the George Washington Colonials went on to win 63–49 at the Curry Hicks Cage last night.

The Minutewomen (8–6, 2–2 in the Atlantic–10) were played tough in the inside by Colonials Martha Williams and Darlene Saar (14 points apiece), as evident by the amount of free throw attempts (20) compared to the attempts from the field (17) in the first half.

Octavia Thomas led the Minutewomen with 17 points and 14 rebounds (10 in the first half). Melissa Gurile added 10 points and seven boards in the second half.

The Minutewomen came out of the blocks strong to take a 9–4 lead with 13:11 to go in the first half on a jumper by co–captain Maleeka Valentine (seven points). That would equal the largest lead of the game for the Minutewomen as they traded shots with the Colonials for much of the first half.

The Colonials tied it up at 12 on Williams' free throw with 9:50 left, only to have the Minutewomen go on a 7–2 run to make it 19–14 with 6:30 to play. UMass then garnered another five point lead 22–17 at 5:09, only to end up tied at 24 at the half.

The Minutewomen spent most of the second half trying to catch up. After a Colonial basket to open the second half, Gurile hit two straight jumpers to go up by two 28–26. A Saar free throw and a Lei Sawyers jumper bumped the score to 29–28, and Minutewoman Beth Kuzmeski hit a jumper with 16:02. The Colonials then took the lead on a Debbie Hemery jumper, and never gave it up.

The Minutewomen kept it close as they came within two points at 7:33 (42–40) after four straight points by Thomas, and at 3:07 (49–47). The Colonials then went on a 12–0 run and never looked back en route to the road game win.

"We came out afraid to shoot the ball," said Coach Joanie O'Brien. "We had a lot of opportunities in the first half, and could have easily been up by ten or twelve. We played a little bit afraid."

"In the first half, we took 17 shots and had 15 turnovers. We had the shots, tried to pass the ball too much, and turned the ball over (25 total)."

The Minutewomen are heading on a three game road stretch, with the first stop at Temple against the Owls on Saturday afternoon at 2 p.m.

Hockey records decisive victory

By MATT VAUTOUR

Psycologists call it displaced aggression, but to the average hockey fan, it an old fashioned butt–kicking. The University of Massachusetts hockey team took out their anger from two embarassing defeats last weekend in Alaska, scoring six second period goals en route to a 10–2 pounding of American International College.

AIC	2
Massachusetts	10

"They were really embarassed [in Alaska]," said UMass Coach Joe Mallen. "This just really shows the pride and dedication that our kids have right now."

The Yellow Jackets looked like they might give the Minutemen a game early on. Starting goalie Shawn Arcidiacano looked sharp early, thwarting several UMass chances including a breakaway by Mike Evans.

UMass finally solved Arcidiacano on a powerplay half way through the period. Dennis Wright, took a pass from Mike Evans, moved around the A.I.C. defense and flipped it over the outstretched goalie to give the Minutemen a 1–0 advantage.

The Minuteman defense, who were minus captain Jaynen Rissling (knee injury) had lapses throughout the first period, giving up the puck on several occasions allowing the Yellow Jackets to get scoring chances.

Junior right wing John Paluzzi made the most of one of those chances at 15:58 as his wrist shot trickled past UMass goalie David Kilduff to tie score at 1–1.

Yellow Jacket coach Gary Wright continued his style of goalie rotation, alternating Shane McConnell with Arcidiacono after each goal allowed, in hopes of shutting down the high powered Minuteman offense.

UMass Assistant Coach Bob Deraney was dissatisfied with his team's lackidasical first period performance and blasted his troops during the first intermission.

"Coach Deraney let them know in no uncertain terms that we were missing checks and that it was unacceptable," said Mallen.

Deraney's tirade sparked the Minutmen in the second period. With less than a minute gone Rob Bonneau broke into the A.I.C. and slipped a pass across the slot to linemate Blair Wagar, who one–timed it past McConnell for his first of three goals.

Three minutes later Wagar struck again three minutes later,

Minutemen hold nothing back in win

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY

Traveling 4,000 miles to be embarrassed by an opponent isn't usually fun. Ask the University of Massachusetts hockey team.

So after returning from Fairbanks, Alaska after losing two games by eight goals apiece (12–4 and 8–0), the Minutemen took out some aggression and showed the fans and their coach that they still have some pride Tuesday night at home.

The result was a 10–2 drubbing of American International College of which Coach Joe Mallen said he was pleased with.

"I wouldn't let fatigue be an excuse for our team," he said. "Coach Calipari was good with me on that. He said that Rick Pitino told him, 'Fatigue makes cowards of us all.'"

The Minutemen were anything but cowards, finishing their checks and scoring six goals in the second period. In fact, you almost saw something intangible as UMass pulled away. You almost saw the team's pride.

"It's more or less pride," said forward Warren Norris, who had two goals and two assists against AIC. "We came out tonight and were all fired up. Everybody was around the goal because of the two losses over the weekend."

As proud as the team was, AIC stuck with them for more than a period. Goaltender Dave Kilduff allowed a soft goal at 5:33 of the second period by Chris Mikula to cut the UMass lead to 3–2.

The fans groaned thinking the Minutemen would let a lesser opponent get the best of them. Mallen said he wasn't too worried about his team, and they rewarded his faith by scoring four unanswered goals before the period ended.

"We've been proud since day one," Mallen said. "I told the guys

FAC to be repaired

By JUSTIN DOYLE
Collegian Staff

Repairs to the exterior of the Fine Arts Center at the University of Massachusetts are planned to begin by the end of the spring semester, but renovations on the interior are a long way off.

Water leaks in the exterior of the Fine Arts Center have caused significant damage to the interior. The state is funding a project to waterproof and repair the structure of the Center.

"The bids for the project have already gone out and are scheduled to be back by March 1," said John A. Robinson, project manager for the University. "Repairs are planned to begin after graduation. They will not interfere with access to classes in the fall semester."

The project is being handled by the Division of Capital Planning and Operations, a state agency.

"The cost of repairs to the exterior have been estimated at $5 to $6 million," said Director of Operations of the Fine Arts Center James E. MacRostie.

Plans for repairs to the Fine Arts Center were set to go out for bid in 1988. The plans were frozen because of lack of funding from the state due to a budget crisis.

A problem in the original design of the Fine Arts Center has caused the leaks in the structure of the building.

"The Fine Arts Center has leaked ever since it was built," MacRostie said. "The philosophy in building the Center was to build a place which sheds water, this idea does not work. Concrete absorbs water."

The repairs to the Fine Arts Center will affect the areas underneath the plaza deck. This will include the Music Library and the Concert Hall.

If the repairs begin this spring, the Concert Hall will be closed from May 15, 1994, to at least Jan. 1, 1995, according to MacRostie.

The roof of the Art Bridge will be repaired and cracks in the expansion joints in the walkway will be fixed. The entire Concert Hall needs to receive a new roof, according to MacRostie.

"Water damage has caused cracks two inches wide in the Art Bridge," said MacRostie. "It will need to be waterproofed. The plazas will have to be torn up and a more modern system for water protection will be built."

The water leaks have caused damage to the interior of the Fine Arts Center. The funding for the repairs to beautify the inside of the Center will have to come from outside the state. The funding received will only repair or reinforce the structure.

"There was water damage to carpets and walls," MacRostie said. "But the funding from the state is only for structural and exterior repairs to the Fine Arts Center. The University will have to find some other way to fund renovations to the interior."

The Fine Arts Center is just one of the areas on campus that is in desperate need of repairs.

"There are over a dozen areas that need repairs, but there is just no money for funding," said MacRostie. "We appreciate that the Fine Arts Center received attention."

Harding knew about attack

By BOB BAUM
Associated Press

PORTLAND, Ore. — Tonya Harding, her hands trembling and voice cracking, admitted Thursday she didn't tell authorities what she knew about the attack on Nancy Kerrigan and pleaded for "my last chance" at an Olympic gold medal.

Harding denied knowing about the attack on her figure skating rival beforehand. The U.S. Olympic Committee said it was "deeply concerned" about Harding's admission that she failed to come forward with information.

The USOC and the U.S. Figure Skating Association have said Harding could be removed from the team if she is linked to the attack and the USFSA Thursday created a panel to investigate Harding.

It was the first step toward what could be her removal from the team.

A source told The Associated Press that Harding's statement may have done her more harm with U.S. Olympic officials than anything that has come out so far.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

"It is heating up the temperature," the source said. "What she said today came creeping very, very close to a lot of things. It could solidify a lot of thought.""

Harding made her emotional admission following a 30–minute workout. She did not answer questions after reading the statement. "Despite my mistakes and my rough edges, I have done. . . nothing to violate my the standards of excellence, of sportsmanship that are expected in an Olympic athlete," Harding said.

"I had no prior knowledge of the planned assault on Nancy Kerrigan," Harding said. "I am responsible, however, for failing to report things I learned about the assault when I returned home from nationals.

"Many of you will be unable to forgive me for that. It will be difficult for me to forgive myself."

Harding said she respects Kerrigan and is sorry the attack happened.

Her statement came as her ex–husband, Jeff Gillooly, spoke to investigators for the second consecutive day in what a source said was an attempt to cut a deal in exchange for implicating Harding in the Jan. 6 attack.

Harvey Schiller, executive director of the USOC, said the organization "is deeply concerned with statements made today by Tonya Harding relative to her stated knowledge of the attack on Nancy Kerrigan at the national championships."

The USFSA said Harding would be on the roster submitted to the USOC for the Winter Games, but the association appointed a five–member panel to investigate the case.

"The panel will will first conduct an investigation to determine if reasonable grounds exist to warrant a disciplinary hearing concerning Harding's status as a member of the U.S. Figure Eating Association," the association said.

UMass students honor legislator

Rep. Tom Finneran earns award for his support of public education

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

The leaders of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association travelled to Boston yesterday to present the Massachusetts House Ways and Means Chairman Tom Finneran the "1993 Legislator of the Year Award."

Student Center for Education and Research Advocacy Legislative Coordinator Amy Lloyd said Finneran was selected for the award because he has demonstrated his commitment to public education despite the fact that his district, Mattapan, sends very few students to UMass.

"It's very hard for him to fund us when only 17 students from Mattapan come here," Lloyd said. "His constituents can't afford to come here. He represents such a poor district, but he is committed to making UMass accessible."

Lloyd said it is difficult for legislators in general to fund UMass because the Massachusetts budget is so large.

"It is not easy to fund UMass because there are so many priorities in the budget," she said. "We need to get the University to serve the state more, and until that happens, funding for the University will not increase."

Lloyd also said Finneran was selected to receive the award because he was influential in eliminating "tuition retention" from the fiscal year 1994 budget. Under the present system, the University collects all of the students' tuition and fee money and sends it to the Massachusetts legislature.

The legislature then appropriates an amount of money back to UMass. Under tuition retention, the University would keep the tuition and fee money instead of sending it to the legislature. Lloyd said tuition retention would have hurt students because the state would decrease its funding for the University system, giving UMass an incentive to raise tuition.

"On the surface, tuition retention looks like a good idea," Lloyd said. "But tuition retention creates the illusion with Massachusetts legislators that UMass has a slush fund of money when it really doesn't. It makes the administration less accountable because it gives them incentive to constantly raise tuition because they get to keep it all. It also gives them less incentive to fight as hard with the legislature for a higher state appropriation.

"The leadership of the SGA worked with Finneran to help defeat tuition retention," she said.

UMass President Michael K. Hooker and Massachusetts Gov. William Weld were both strong proponents of tuition retention, Lloyd said.

Blood donors turn out to ease supply crisis

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY

The American Red Cross blood drive enjoyed an overwhelming response from students yesterday after a shortage of blood was publicized.

"I would like to thank the UMass community for rallying for the cause," said Jodi Liquornik, a Red Cross donor recruitment specialist.

According to Liquornik, all the blood collected will serve the Northeast region, which includes such states as Massachusetts and Maine.

"It is a really good thing," said Liquornik. "People of all ages can give blood and it helps so many people."

The shortage of blood is due to the weather, Liquornik said. Blood drives have been cancelled, and people haven't been able to give blood. She said an article in yesterday's Collegian was "a tremendous help" in recruiting donors.

A single blood donation can help three people because the blood is broken down into plasma, red blood cells and platelets. Liquornik said donors of all blood types are welcomed, especially those donors with rare blood types.

"I try to give blood every time I see a sign," said Adam Jones, a graduate student.

After the blood is taken, it is tested for 11 different diseases in the Red Cross testing lab in Dedham, Mass.

As of 3 p.m. yesterday, the blood drive had recruited about 107 people, nearing the Red Cross' goal of 110 donors.

Some students worried about fainting and were a little squeamish. Robert McKenna, a junior who lives in Amherst, gave blood for the first time yesterday because of the shortage.

"It did not hurt," he said. "I just sat and thought about other things and it wasn't bad at all. I didn't even think about it."

"There are all these nurses around," said Jones. "They are here to take care of you."

The entire process of giving blood takes about an hour. Donors go to the "canteen" and are given orange juice and cookies, and wait until they are comfortable enough to leave.

"I always wanted to give blood," said Beth Rotondi, a freshman who also gave blood for the first time yesterday.

State halts early release of inmates

BOSTON (AP) -- An appeals court judge on Thursday gave the Department of Corrections and lawyers for prison inmates suing the state two weeks to prepare arguments on the early release of several hundred prisoners.

Twenty prisoners were released before Public Safety Secretary Thomas Rapone told correction officials on Wednesday to stop releasing them, defying Superior Court Judge Wendie I. Gershengorn's order, while an emergency hearing is sought before a Supreme Judicial Court justice.

Gershengorn's order to release 300 to 600 prisoners came in a preliminary injunction she issued last week in a class action suit brought by state prison inmates.

She said convicts can deduct 2.5 days from their sentences for each month they participated in work, days per month.

> "There was no intention or desire on my part to disregard the court order. The Department of Correction had not exhausted its apellate rights."
> – Thomas Rapone Public Safety Secretary

The deductions, known as served good time, had applied only to time served after trial.

The Department of Correction had appealed Gershengorn's order, but it was upheld Monday by Appeals Court Justice Rya Draben, said James Pingeon, staff attorney for Massachusetts Correctional Legal Services Inc., which represented the prisoners.

On Thursday Dreben granted a stay of the injunction. She told both sides to have briefs prepared by Feb. 9 and be ready to argue in court the next week.

Rapone had said Gershengorn had acted too fast and administration lawyers did not have enough time to check whether inmates had taken part in the programs in jail.

"There was no Intention or desire on my part to disregard the court order," Rapone said. "The Department of Correction had not exhausted its appellate rights, and I believe that it could briefly defer releasing prisoners while the department immediately sought a stay from the court."

Vets urge end to sanctions

Senate agrees it's time to put Vietnam War behind us

By JIM ABRAMS
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Twenty years after the last American soldier left Vietnam, two senators who bear the scars of that war helped convince their colleagues Thursday the time has come to lift trade sanctions.

It's time to "put the war behind us," said Sen. John Kerry, D–Mass., a Vietnam veteran who was wounded three times.

The 62–38 vote urging the administration to lift the trade embargo "expeditiously" was not binding, but it provides considerable impetus for the administration as it moves toward normalizing relations with the former enemy.

White House spokeswoman Dee Dee Myers said President Clinton has not decided whether to lift the trade sanctions, but "we certainly welcome the Senate's sentiment on that."

"Progress has been made, but the overall issue is still under review. We don't have a firm time line" for a decision on the sanctions, she said.

Veterans' groups, most strongly against relaxing restrictions on Vietnam until there is a full accounting of Americans still missing from the war, were angered by the vote.

"We were somewhat stunned that they didn't listen to the veterans and families" who feel Vietnam is still not forthcoming on the POW–MIA issue, said Phil Budahn, spokesman for the American Legion.

Yet it was the Vietnam veterans in the Senate — led by Kerry and Sen. John McCain, R–Ariz. — who were the most eloquent in urging an end to the enmity and the beginning of trade relations.

"If you want to serve the families you will vote to lift the embargo. If you want to put the war behind us and act in a statesmanlike fashion and move to the future and protect the interests of this nation you will vote to lift the embargo," Kerry said.

McCain spoke in a hushed voice of his own six years in captivity in a North Vietnam prisoner–of–war camp. He said the fates of those still missing could best be learned by expanding relations with Hanoi

"I don't often discuss my past experiences in the Vietnam War," McCain said, recalling how his communist jailers threatened that those prisoners who didn't cooperate would never return home.

"Therefore, many times, at great physical risk, we did everything we could to account for those who were imprisoned," McCain said.

Alumni service award is given to UMass sociologist

The 11th annual Distinguished Alumni Service Award from Missouri Western State College was recently given to Pamela Quiroz, assistant professor of sociology at the University of Massachusetts.

Quiroz graduated from Missouri Western in 1983. She was honored for professional achievement and distinction, humanitarian contributions, and her work for the community and state.

She is the co-author of a book about to be released which discusses the social structure of high schools and its effects on teaching. She has also had articles published in the Journal of Research on Adolescents and the Sociology of Education.

UMass professor wins Public Health Award

David Hosmer, professor in the School of Public Health at the University of Massachusetts, received an award from the American Public Health Association for his studies in the field of biostatistics and public health.

The award was presented to him in San Francisco at the association's annual meeting. it represented Hosmer's quality of excellence in research, academic development and teaching.

Hosmer has taught at the University since 1973. He is the co-author of several books such as Applied Logistics Regression and Adequacy of Sample Size in Health Studies. Hosmer has also had articles published in Preventive Medicine, Health Service Research, American Journal of Public Health and Journal of Epidemiology.

Architects to judge students' model houses

On Jan. 29, 14 MBA students will have the model houses they built judged by three professional architects. The judging will begin at 2 p.m. on the second floor in the School of Management library.

"It gives students a hands-on experience in a real-world situation. In a group dynamics class, it doesn't make sense for me to stand there and lecture," said professor Michael Cavanaugh.

The goal of this project was for the students to learn how to work with drafting software in order to design a house. They also had to work with a styrofoam modeling material to make the house.

Student nurse at UMass has cable television show

Bill Martin, a student nurse here at the University, is now a producer of an information and news show for veterans called "Veticare." It has recently aired on Nov. 11.

The idea of the program first came from a class assignment. His project was to design a program that focuses on a particular group in the community. Martin concentrated on veterans' issues.

Martin is currentiy enrolled in the RN to BSN Program, a bacheior's degree program for registered nurses, here at the School of Nursing at the University.

After attending a six-week class in television production, Martin's program was reviewed and approved by TV-6. So far viewers' responses have been positive on the new show.

Mother testifies for son's defense

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. — The mother of a student who gunned down six victims at a college campus tearfully testified Thursday that her son showed no feeling when she met him in jail afterward.

The woman, Lin Lin Lo, of Billings, Mont., was called as a defense witness in the trial of her son, Wayne Lo.

He has been held without bail at the Berkshire County Jail on murder and other charges for the Dec. 14, 1992, shooting spree at Simon's Rock College of Bard in Great Barrington.

Wiping tears from her eyes, his mother told jurors that she barely recognized him at the jail afterward.

"The Wayne I saw there was not the son I have," she said. "I look at him and he looks empty."

During her testimony in the hushed courtroom, the mother looked over at her son a few times. But Lo, who has listened impassively and stared at other witnesses, sometimes looked away or hid his face in his hands.

His mother said she now suffers from her own feelings of guilt.

"In this year, I question myself, 'How come you didn't see anything wrong?'" she said.

Lawyers for Lo, 19, of Billings, have conceded that Lo was the shooter, but argue that he should be acquitted because he was temporarily insane.

Psychologists have testified that Lo suffered from schizophrenia when he stalked across campus with the semi- automatic rifle, shooting with apparent calm at passersby.

Lo's father, Chia Wei Lo of Billings, a former military officer for the Chinese Nationalists who now runs a restaurant, has testified that his son afterward told him he was acting as an agent of God.

He said his son believed he needed to free the campus of lying, homosexuality and drug use.

Search is on for new dean of grad school

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

A search for a new dean for the University of Massachusetts graduate school has begun. A committee of 13 members will be welcoming nominations until Feb. 10 and accepting applications until Feb. 16.

Robert B. Hallock, physics professor and chairman of the committee panel, said nominations will be limited to professors on campus only.

"It was discussed with the campus administration, and the view of committee feit it would be appropriate that the nominations be confined to campus only," Hallock said.

Hallock said many nominations have been made so far and expects the numbers to increase as Feb. 10 arrives.

Last spring, the Faculty Senate passed a plan developing the job of the vice chancellor for research, graduate studies and economic development, and added the post of a graduate dean.

The dean will replace Samuel Conti, hold the vice chanceilor post.

"The entire structure of vice chancelior was expanded. The dean will be helpful in keeping track of graduate studies," Hallock said.

Hallock said the committee wants nominations of professors who show cultural diversity because of the muiticuitural vitaiity at UMass.

Several responsibilities of the dean will be ministering to the staff of the vice chancellor for research, graduate studies and economic development.

The dean will also carry out policies in relation to the graduate education at the University. A major responsibility wiil be representing the Graduate School in working out issues with the Graduate Employee Organization.

The committee is looking for a person with an honored publication record and is a distnguished teacher.

They must also have qualifications of experience as a graduate student advisor and knowledge of a university with an in-depth research department.

Hallock also said they are looking for a professor who has an understanding and respect of graduate student's issues and ability and wanting to work with graduate students and faculty.

He said the University has not had a dean for the graduate school in a long time, and now feel it is necessary to have one.

The committee is hoping to choose a new dean as soon as possible, so the post can be filled by July 1.

Voting is the key to change

"The Earth belongs to the living. The dead have neither powers nor rights to it." — Thomas Jefferson

In the early 1790s, the debate over public debt drove a stake through the heart of an infant nation. Jefferson made his point very clear: no generation was justified in imposing the burden of debt upon its children. Unfortunately for the fair-skinned Virginian, a hot-shot young lawyer from New York named Alexander Hamilton had the ear of George Washington.

At Hamilton's urging, Washington's new administration assumed all of the state debts in exchange for the privilege of a universal excise tax (which was initially a tax on whiskey not consumed for home use, and ultimately led to the Whiskey Rebellion) and paved the yellow brick road which led to the exponential growth of our bloated federal government.

In the early 1990s, public debt again has the potential to divide the nation much like it did 200 years ago.

But in the early stages of our republic, the privilege to vote was only granted to landowners, to ensure that voters were well informed. Since then, universal suffrage has been granted in order to hold officials more accountable. But as the information to the voting population is becoming increasingly sensationalized, it can often be very difficult to thrust issues into the public debate.

Enter Ross Perot. Even though he's about as extinct as a brontosaurus, he did our generation a great service. Without his bumper sticker rhetoric, Joe Six-Pack still wouldn't have any idea what the national debt was (he now merely has a foggy notion, but that's a step). Now that the national debt has been thrust into the public debate, we must take advantage before something more sensational, like ice- skating or penis-cutting, captures the American public's flea- like attention span.

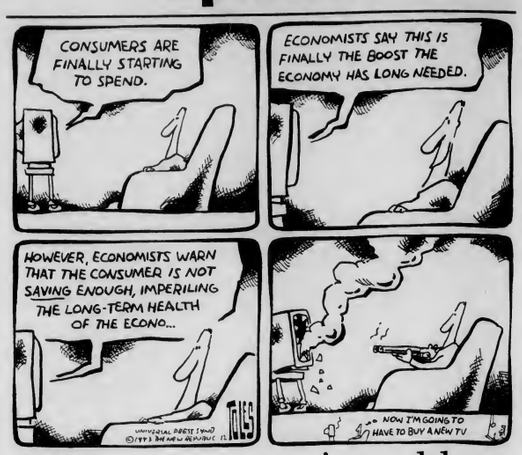
Andrew Davidson

Unfortunately, Generation X does not have someone as articulate as Thomas Jefferson to crusade against budget deficits. Even if we did, it would be of no use, for today's statesman is only as persuasive as his constituency is informed.

These days, aristocratic eloquence must be replaced by democratic participation. The only thing which will save us from the manacles of debt is political activism, but it must be an activism that evolves along with our times. A rally on the Student Union steps led by a maniac with a bullhorn is not going to convince Capitol Hill to trim its budget.

Our generation mustn't look back at the Woodstock sit-ins of the 1960s. The problems which confront us today will require more attention and thought than at any other time in history. Becoming involved in politics does not require external action but rather internal action. The primary responsibility of the American individual is being both an active voter and an informed citizen.

Despite the long-winded rhetoric of the typical apathetic twenty-something, voting is essential in the steering of the national agenda. "Students don't vote," declared Georgia Sen. Wyche Fowler, when addressing a group of student volunteers demanding budget cuts. "Do you expect me to come in here and kiss your ass?"



Fowler's attitude gives our generation a clear message: you should not expect anything from your democratic government if you are not a participant in it. Pollsters keep track of everyone's voting patterns, and are acutely aware of our participation — or lack thereof. Do you think that if 90 percent of students motivated themselves and dropped by their local city hall voting booth each November that legislators would have such a callous attitude toward us?

Once a group of people is established as a voting bloc, our government begins to listen to their demands. But only when that group is certifiably declared well-informed does the public debate shift away from the soap-box rhetoric that most Americans weaned on television are used to. If those whom we elect are forced to speak to a more enlightened public, real issues can once again be wrestled away from the insular circles of Washington.

The problem we have in this country is not our government or our media; the problem lies with the public. Our government will only do as much as we demand of them, and our media will only provide what we're capable of ingesting.

Restoring our national character can be as simple as reading the paper every day and voting every year. But accountability of our voters is dependent upon motivated voters. Until Generation X rids itself of its apathetic attitude, all we can expect from our leaders is a deaf ear and an unkind word.

Andrew Davidson is the Collegian night graphics manager.

AIDS is everyone's problem

Often when a writer addresses an audience, he is envisioned as though he were speaking to the whole audience, not speaking to you, as an individual. I want to get personal — in fact, it's crucial. I am telling this to you, not 19,000 people. I have had unprotected sex, and I am afraid.

Even though the relationship was monogamous, and I have not had unprotected sex since, I am still afraid. She had spoken of another guy before me. There have been other women, and I am not sure if everything that went on was so responsible. At the time it seemed logical, and very enjoyable. But I had not taken life so seriously then that I was afraid to lose it.

Death for me is a powerful black panther lurking in the shadows, and my experience with it has left that black panther — in poster form — on my wall. It's a mute reminder to enjoy life, since this animal likes to sneak up on us. I once passed out knowing I was seconds from suffocating to death, and I have seen death. I have seen the steel ice in its eyes and felt a fear that makes you hollow as it freezes up your spine.

So it makes this AIDS thing very real for me. I don't want to die. I like spending time with my parents and friends, and look forward to a rewarding future. Knowing that is all going to end was unimaginable, until it happened. I saw the suffering that AIDS patients go through — the social death, as it has been called, since people do not want to go near its victims. It brought a whole new fear, a new fear that was uncovered by an old one. And I don't want to live in fear.

This new fear is that I may one day be guilty of prejudice toward an AIDS victim based on my fear of the deadly disease. My fear is that I might make things worse for some poor soul who might only want to live a few more days. My fear is that I might deny some unknown joy to this person and unknowingly kill their will to live, the only thing that keeps them alive. I believe my fear has already become a reality for many people.

Michael Einhorn

I also believe that our media-based culture has taken the caring out of the things that do not directly affect us. There is an apathy that makes the floods in the Midwest seem like a mild drainage problem, that allows us to ignore the innocent Iraqis who died in our raids during the Persian Gulf War, that tells us that only 24 people died in the recent Los Angeles earthquake so it wasn't a big deal.

Those were 24 completely innocent people! They did nothing wrong; they were just like you and me. And now, even as they have lost their lives, the news continues to feed this disgusting indifference.

So when AIDS hits the TV screen, we stare helplessly, not really believing that it could happen to us. This attitude is sick, it's wrong and it's about time we all woke up and dropped the b.s. about sex without condoms feeling better. How about sex with an oxygen mask on? How about sex with an IV strapped to your wrist? This is real, this affects you.

After much thought on this subject, my first conclusion is that if I am ever to contract the virus, I will not go out with a quick bang like I originally thought I would. I will fight it to the end; it could be years before it takes my life.

My second conclusion is that I will always, always, always wear a condom during sex.

And my most important conclusion is to live like I have never lived before and force myself to pick up on and enjoy each and every good thing that I see. Tomorrow might be different.

Housing policies are unfair

Question of the Week: What would you do if while you were sitting in your dorm room minding your own business someone suddenly burst in unannounced, tactfully declared he or she was your new roommate and proceeded to move in and drop all their stuff on the middle of your floor?

Give up?

My point exactly.

The other night around 9:30 p.m., I was zoning out in front of the tube, trying to wind down from a day of roadrunner action between Whitmore, the Textbook Annex and other assorted destinations when there was a knock at the door.

Before I could even answer it, a key turned in the lock and it opened to reveal my resident assistant and two strangers.

"Hey, dude. I'm your new roommate," one of the strangers said. Before I could say anything, they finished inventory and the stranger had taken off to start moving his stuff into the room. Meanwhile, I was still trying to grasp what the hell had just happened.

My RA explained that the Housing Assignment Office had just assigned this person to the empty space in my room without any notification or forewarning to the residence director or the Field-Grayson Cluster Office — not even a phone call!

So, here was this complete stranger who just barged into my room, totally unannounced, deposited his belongings in the middle of the floor and then disappeared. Keep in mind that this is all standard operating procedure for Housing.

Amazing.

To me, it was just adding insult to injury. Last semester, they had the infinite wisdom to room me with a freshman. Now consider the circumstances: I was a 23-year-old first semester senior facing a difficult schedule of upper level courses within my major.

My roommate: 18 going on 19, a first semester frosh and ready to party the whole semester away.

Is there something wrong with this picture?

Don't get me wrong — I realize it wasn't my roommate's fault that he was placed with me, or this new person's fault who moved into my room the other night.

Considering the amount of money and time invested on our part, it should be one of our basic rights to be alerted in advance if Housing plans to move someone in with us.

John Winchell

Housing is singularly to blame for such horror stories.

It is their own backward rules and regulations that caused everyone involved in both situations so much stress and discomfort.

Moreover, when they moved this person in with me so recently, it turns out there were other males in my building who had double singles and also fewer seniority points than me. Technically, he should have been moved in with them in the first place because those with higher seniority points supposedly get preference within a dorm. But, once again, Housing couldn't get their act together enough to obtain an accurate residence roster before they began moving new residents into a building.

This is my point: if Housing doesn't wake up and revise its policies soon, it's going to see a lot of angry former residents moving off-campus and costing the University thousands of dollars. I am on the verge of this kind of action myself, and I know I'm not alone.

As students, we pay an exorbitant amount of money to attend this University and receive an education. Considering the amount of money and time invested on our part, it should be one of our basic rights to be alerted in advance if Housing plans to move someone in with us in a dormitory situation.

The existing regulations are unfair, inconsiderate and rude to students and should be changed immediately.

My experiences are just two examples of an overall trend toward poor and inadequate rule-making by the upper echelons of Whitmore.

But then again, what else is new?

John Winchell is a Collegian staff member.

Blame our culture, stupid

"The fault, dear Brutus, Is not in our stars but in ourselves..."
— William Shakespeare

One of the things Bill Clinton spoke briefly about in his State of the Union address was our faltering education system. The evidence for the President's complaints are clear: high-wage jobs are leaving for Asia and Europe and our public discourse is always managing to find the lowest common denominator. The results are no less clear: families' wages are no higher than they were 20 years ago and the public knows more about the Bobbitts' sex life than the Clintons' health care plan.

The issue the President avoided was who to blame — bad teachers or stingy taxpayers. No, that's too easy because who's really to blame for this mess is you and I. The culture we have generated creates misplaced priorities among our young people.

Children don't learn from school because they don't think school is important. Most folks think that's just nature at work. What is at work is our simple-mindedness.

What feat of logic convinced us that vegging for hours watching TV was more natural for kids than learning through reading and writing? I thought kids were by nature hyper and curious, not couch potatoes.

If you look at other cultures, you realize if the adults really care about education, so do the children. If adults never exercise or read, then their children become couch potatoes too.

Neil Carpenter

Yes, "stay in school" and "get your diploma" is what kids often hear from parents and peers. However, often coming from the same people they also hear "you never learn anything in school," and "school work is for suckers." The message is clear: go to school, but don't take it seriously.

In many other countries, school is important culturally. Education is not about scamming your way out of school by convincing your mother you are sick, it's about learning something. Japan invests less per student than the United States, but the returns are higher because school work isn't something kids need to be conned into doing.

I'm not arguing in favor of a world where teenagers commit suicide if they don't ace their SATs. I would not be here right now if that was the case. What I'm saying is that we oddly choose to dislike people who do well on their SATs, demoting them in social stature instead of promoting them.

Let's face it, even here, at a well-respected university, some of us choose to make negative judgments about people because they are academically oriented. Out there in the heartland, being focused on school, be it high school or college, is even less well-respected.

What is respected by people young and old is ability in sports and other social endeavors. These things are great, but how important should they be to kids that spend night after night playing street ball when they can barely read? They are hoping for a scholarship and a shot at the pros as the way out, but chances are it will never come.

At the same time, colleges across America are looking for more academically-qualified people of color to bring into their schools. So we are putting the people who are the most needy into the path of greatest resistance for the rest of their lives because our culture gives more respect to basketball players than teachers, doctors and even Presidents.

Neil Carpenter is a junior in the School of Management.

Mascis to bring solo show to Iron Horse

COURTESY FRANK OCKENFELS
Guitar guru J.Mascis

By BRIAN BABINEAU
Collegian Staff

More than a few years ago, before those silly boys from Seattle made the "g" word a musical standard, a young man and his band created fuzzy, distorted and strangely melodic guitar noises that set a new tone in alternative rock. That band was Dinosaur Jr., and the unique and impressive guitar noise belonged to frontman and Amherst native J.Mascis.

The very tall and gangly musician produced some critically acclaimed albums in the late 1980s and early '90s including Bug and Green Mind.

His songwriting emphasizes everyday feelings of love and loss delivered in a characteristic laid-back whine that belies the emotional content of the songs. The music recalls some of the more inventive guitar playing of the seventies with the addition of a creative distorted sound.

With last year's Where You Been, Mascis and Dinosaur Jr. reached new popular heights which included a spot on last summer's Lollapalooza tour and a coveted homecoming show at our very own spring concert.

The video for "Start Choppin'" received heavy airplay on MTV. Mascis' guitar work and songwriting reached new heights, and his work made other, more popular rock groups like Stone Temple Pilots look silly.

Now Mascis is doing a few solo shows featuring him and his brilliant guitar work, and luckily for us, he is coming home again to preform.

J.Mascis will be performing at the Iron Horse in Northampton on Saturday, Jan. 29 at 10 p.m. Tickets are $10. For more information call 584-0610.

Stories jump from stage to screen

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

The past month has seen several high-profile "screen adaptations" of successful stage plays. Here is one theater critic's view of the best and worst.

Gypsy: Director Emile (Sister Act) Ardolino's film version of the Sondheim/Styne musical about Mama Rose, the world's worst stage mother, has all the unlikely flash and polish of an MGM movie musical in which the run-down city streets are paved with gold, and the B-rate strippers look like Ziegfield girls.

Ardolino seems to have missed the point of the original musical (some of which, alas, has been re-tooled and sanitized) — instead of revealing the flaws of the driven Mama, as a wiser director would have, he tries to hide them behind production numbers.

This overplaying of the show is also apparent in the performances. Bette Midler plays Mama Rose as a histrionic harpy, all flashing eyes, bared teeth, and waving arms, who teeters through a finale so wobbly that it starts to look like the beginning of a flashback sequence.

One can see the seams in Midler's acting through all the hysterics. This makes her character seem less real, like a silent film star enacting an allegory about mothers who love too much — which, of course, Gypsy is. But this is a show which should move its audience rather than give them a headache.

The great fantasy finale, where Rose suffers a nervous breakdown in musical form, has been punched up with brighter lights and prettier costumes — sending Ardolino and Midler into the same trap as Rose's disastrous vaudeville act by distancing the audience in the act of pandering to it. C-.

Shawdlands: The problems of this Richard Attenborough filmization are drawn from the same expensive well. If a few critics sniffed that William Nicholson's original stage play was too stationary, it nevertheless reflected the patterns of despair in the routine life of C.S. Lewis, which never brought him far from the stodgy classrooms of Oxford and the cramped sitting room of his country home.

Attenborough's film, with all its unnecessary helicopter shots and bizarre exotic locales, seems to be the product of an overactive cinematographer far removed from the project at hand.

And if Bette Midler in Gypsy was impaired by overacting, then Anthony Hopkins is downright crippled. After a lifetime of being debonair, Hopkins hasn't the slightest clue how to play an ordinary man.

But then, the last thing Attenborough would have wanted was a real person as his protagonist. Shadowlands is no longer a play about a withered and withering novelist who finds love late in life with a tired, cancer-ridden divorcee. It is now a film epic about beautiful people in attractive suits running through fields and kissing in the rain.

Hopkins and his co-star Debra Winger (both of whom should have known better) are also victim to the same excessive strokes that Ardolino brought to Gypsy — as if Hollywood honestly believes that the best way to be faithful to a stageplay is to film with excess rarely seen outside of Greek drama.

In his powerhouse performance on stage, Nigel Hawthorne suffered loneliness, love and loneliness again with the cool resignation of a person conscious of appearances. When Hawthorne finally began to cry for his lost love, the agony came out in a series of silent, acutely controlled gasps which seemed to strangle the actor — until all that could follow was hysteria.

It was the only moment of abandon that life had allowed him, slipped temporarily from the hard casing of propriety, only to be painfully swallowed and returned there forevermore. The detachment was heartbreaking.

In the current film, Hopkins' Lewis dribbles with aesthetically-placed tears, drools with rage, and emotes such overblown and unceasing longing that one has to wonder whether he has ever heard the word "repressed" (which the script keeps reminding us he is). When Hopkins cries, in the over-directed and overdue finale, there isn't a wet eye in the house. F.

Six Degrees of Separation: Director Fred Schepesi's film of John Guare's play is a welcome wonder: a film version which not only does justice to the stage play, but actually improves upon it.

Schepesi is wise enough to trust the success of the original stage play, about a con man who upsets the lives of a posh New York couple. Although some scenes have been visually reconceived, every word of Guare's magnificent play has been left intact. Stockard Channing has made the transition to film beautifully, turning in an Oscar-worthy turn as the ordered woman who finds the intrusion of Will Smith's hustler to be a life-defining event.

Six Degrees represents playwright John Guare at his biting best. As he did so artfully in The House of Blue Leaves, Guare has created a satire with an undertow. So sly and ingratiating is the author's wit and manner that one remains as blind to the welling tragedy as the characters on screen.

Directed with a self-effacing flash (that dissipates as the evening continues) this film is the ultimate joy ride, a hilarious and upsetting look at imagination, and the act of self-examination. A.

Band juggles a catalogue of style

COURTESY MONGHANI

Local band Monghani.

By STEVE DELCORE
Collegian Correspondent

One of the most underrated as well as underappreciated bands in the area is certainly Monghani. The four-piece Northampton-based band deserves to be held in the high regard that any band lucky enough to escape this area is.

The problem seems to be that Monghani can play their instruments, and this doesn't sit well with the fans out here.

Monghani culminates around its centerpiece, guitarist Russell Chudnofsky. Visually startling but sonically correct, this tortured-hair virtuoso has an uncanny ear for obtuse hooks and a propensity for skillfully juggling a whole catalogue of musical styles. His two biggest muses, blues and loud noise, are largely responsible for propelling Monghani into the vanguard area bands.

The rhythm section of ever-smiling drummer Dan Koetke and muscular bassist Scott Kesner mollify Russell's tendency toward flagrant rankness.

Kesner's bass lines denote a shrewd high-gloss facility for clever disco and funk perversions, while Koetke's self- contained drums are a clinically precise testament to the busy, spasmodic drummers that ruin so much of this area's best music.

The high-concept vocals and thrifty guitar work of professional clam digger Jerry Smith sharply appropriate the discernable melodies. Agreeable guitaring amends Russell's profusion of undaunted feedback and high frustration warbling.

Piloted by Mark Miller's meticulous production, the quartet has recorded and will soon release its debut. It's pleasantly disturbing though thoroughly enjoyable.

The opening cut, "New York City Girl," broaches a wonderful slice of sinister pop while its closer, "Cops are Here," is a raucous goof targeting party-going pigs who should be off fighting crime.

But Monghani seems most comfortable during their whimsical, groove-oriented numbers. Their finest track, "Pseudo-Intellectual," is a jokey but propulsive funk-thing that laughs at the brooding Amherst anti-intellectuals.

"Clowns and Crazies," delves into the battered psyche of a Pepto Bismol-swilling promiscuity with a resentment that cunningly masks genuine affection.

And all of this from a band that asks little more of their fans than the unmanageable question, "What Yo You Think My Hair?"

The ubiquitous Monghani has run an unusual gamut of gigs. They've opened for Big Country, The Mighty Mighty Bosstones, Thelonious Monster and Bop Harvey, but lost a battle of the bands at the shady Wolves Den to a group of fat, balding men incapable of entertaining a diner crowd.

Monghani has entertained and been lauded by hundreds at Pearl Street and Boston's Nightstage, and they've driven away lunch time crowds at the Hatch. They've met with mass approval at Sheehan's, Avenue C and T.T. the Tear's but are often second banana to the pool table at the Hadley Pub.

But can you fault these four unevenly-dressed guys? No, you'd have to love them.

Monghani will be appearing at the Brewery on Feb. 13 and again on Feb. 19 at the Baystate Cabaret.

■ men's swimming

The 400-yard freestyle relay team of Santa, Clark, Reich and Menton finished off UConn, placing first in 3:10.80.

The victory for UMass was a come-from-behind effort — something that has become the norm for the Minutemen.

"We found a way to do it," Yarworth said. "The team accepted the challenge."

Tomorrow the Minutemen travel to New Hampshire as they look to run their record to 11-0.

UNH is a team that is well coached and has good swimmers but lacks the depth needed to beat UMass.

Yarworth said he will use this meet as an opportunity for his team to swim in off events.

"I want them to always accept the challenge," Yarworth said.

Yarworth has told his team to be relaxed on Saturday and swim well.

In defense of Stone Temple Pilots

By CALEB COCHRAN
Collegian Staff

They're rock music's new favorite whipping boy. They've been accused of imitating Pearl Jam in their videos. They're Rolling Stone's "Worst Band" of 1993. My 15-year-old brother calls them "wanna-bes." They're Stone Temple Pilots, and I'm here to defend them.

I don't know where the comparisons to Pearl Jam began. I've seen the video for STP's "Plush" maybe once or twice. if a video is the source of all the controversy, that's a shame. In this MTV age, it seems that a video is just as important as the song it represents.

I'm not sure where this mentality comes from, but I don't agree at all. With a rock band, sound should be the first concern. Not image, and certainly not videos.

You see, Stone Temple Pilots do not sound like Pearl Jam. Play any song from STP's Core for Pearl Jam's Eddie Vedder, and he'll agree with me.

Pearl Jam plays with more of a raw emotion than STP does. Eddie Vedder dives head-first into his singing, and the rest of the band jumps on his back. They are a marvelous band, no question. But they don't sound much like STP.

> "I don't care if Weiland wears a damn Eddie Vedder wig and gets a Pearl Jam tattoo. . ."

Stone Temple Pilots hook you with a catchy riff and pound it into your head as loud, as fast and as many times as they can. Lead singer Weiland sings with great intensity, and his vocals are a big part of the band's sound.

However, what sticks in the listener's head are those blazing guitar riffs, courtesy of Dean DeLeo. The thrashing riff to open "Sex Type Thing," the guitar based foundations of "Crackerman," "Wicked Garden" — even "Plush." These are the sounds that make you remember this band.

Are they as good as Pearl Jam? Maybe not, but who cares? They're different. I don't care what Weiland looks like in his videos. Maybe he was trying to look like Eddie Vedder. I don't care if Weiland wears a damn Eddie Vedder wig and gets a Pearl Jam tattoo, just as long as STP keeps tossing out catchy, speed-pop anthems like the tunes that make up Core.

"You know Brad, you've done a remarkable job on this project... really remarkable... Yes, I'm very pleased with your progress... How'd you like to meet me at the Collegian after work for cocktails?..." "Um... sure Andy... why not?"

Your Horoscope

By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Glory in the honors that are heaped on you now. VIPs like your style and derring-do. Just a word of warning: Power can corrupt. Remain true to your high ideals while expanding your influence.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): A good weekend to travel. Those of you who are fast learners should assume a more active role in business decisions. When making a romantic overture, use finesse. Avoid coming on too strong.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): Even minor changes can make routine work more interesting. Check with experts before finalizing long-term agreements or signing contracts. You may soon move into a new position at work.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): Focusing on others' needs brings new harmony to the group. Someone cannot resist sharing a secret with you; keep this person's confidences. A new romantic interest will impact dramatically on your life.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Re-evaluate financial policy. Changes must be made. See yourself as a leader; walk with distinction. Emphasize your independence and will power on your way to the top.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Impulsive decisions will not bring the results you seek. Look before you leap into a tricky situation. Frank discussions with friends bear fruit.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Remember, any career frustrations are temporary. Turn to your family for support and encouragement. Rubbing shoulders with influential people could lead to an exciting relationship. Play a waiting game.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): A behind-the-scenes arrangement will give you the power to mold events. Tap into important resource. Joining a professional or community-minded group will widen your social circle and boost business.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): Those who count begin to understand. A private meeting helps you gain approval for an unusual project or alliance.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): A secret agreement hold great promise. Move ahead with confidence. Community affairs hold more interest than in the past. Events at a distance have a positive effect on your job performance.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Difference of opinion can lead to mutually-agreeable solutions. Sharing a creative idea brings higher profits! Questions raised by a family member could be very divisive.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Your enthusiasm and energy are very attractive to those in authority. Linking up with like-minded individuals will advance your goals. However, beware of smooth talkers who have designs on your resources.

Men's Track meets in full

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's track team seeks to boost its record above .500 in tomorrow's meet at the University of New Hampshire, where UMass will compete with UNH, Vermont, Holy Cross, Central Connecticut State and Hartford.

Coach Ken O'Brien's squad starts the day with a 6-6 record, one that has O'Brien "a little disappointed." UMass will have the services of its full roster tomorrow after two January meets where several athletes were absent.

The first of those meets was the New England Challenge Cup trials, held at the University of Maine on Jan. 15. UMass, placed in the North bracket of the competition, finished fourth out of five with 45 points, behind Dartmouth (115), Boston College (89), and Maine (79) and ahead of New Hampshire (28). This put UMass in the consolation bracket of the following week's finals at Boston University.

At the trials, UMass could not muster a third place overall finish to qualify for the finals' championship bracket, but four Minutemen placed second in their events. Rob Pedowitz ran the 400 in 52.17, Brian King finished the 600 in 1:15.19, the 4 x 880 relay team of Rick Copley, King, Steve Paris and Colin Confoey posted a time of 8:11.9, and the Distance Medley relay team of Chris Povoiny, Terry O'Neill, Walter Stock and Thomas Szumita was done in 11:09.90.

"It was relatively close to what I had expected," O'Brien said of his team's performance.

That didn't stop UMass from logging two first place finishes in the New England Challenge Cup consolation championship on Jan. 21, when it placed fourth in a nine- team field. Tom Galligani won the triple jump with a jump of 44 feet, 3.5 inches, and Marc Lefebvre led the shotput competition with a throw of 47 feet, 10.75 inches.

O'Brien believes he needs more of his team to place in the top slots for UMass to improve its even record.

"I'm hoping some of the kids who comprise our depth and balance will break out of the pack and become individual threats," O'Brien said. "So it will be interesting to see what [the absent athletes] add to the mix."

have stayed close throughout their careers.

Lately they have begun battling against each other. For wins, recognition and recruits.

When a job opens around the country, Huggins and Calipari usually top the list, no matter where the position may be. And while the both say they are content where they are, someday, down the road, the two could both be competing for a top, top job.

"There was a time when a Cincinnati or a UMass was a stepping stone, but not anymore," said Donald. "Those schools have made themselves very desirable, these guys won't move lateral, to a Providence or something. Maybe a Michigan or North Carolina or Kansas down the line, but that's a ways off."

And when it comes to recruiting, where school is pitted against school and often coach against coach, it's not long before the bad blood is spilled. The two both went hard after Pittsburgh school boy Danny Fortson, one of the nation's top seniors. Calipari wanted him, but Fortson committed to UC in November. Calipari claims it has not affected things.

"I don't take (stuff) personal," Calipari said.

Calipari and Huggins dined last night after the game. It hasn't been completely lost, at least not out here.

are looking at meets, emphasizing that it is a team sport first, individuals second," Kuzara said.

"Erica Baum has come through well for us so far on the vault and bars, we all seem ready to go," he said.

An overall score of 188 points at Rhode Island is probably good enough to get the team into the top 20. Kuzara stressed balance as the key to success this weekend.

"We will not run into many problems because of our excellent balance. This year we may be a better team without Tammy [Marshall, graduated star from last year's team], everyone's performance will be recognized," he Kuzara.

very well," Newcomb said. "I'm excited because she will finish her career well here."

Kerri Hodge has also been a key part of the success thus far.

"She's getting back into the swing of things," Newcomb said. "She's coming on strong for the ECACs."

Presently, 12 UMass swimmers qualified for the ECACs. The maximum number of swimmers that can attend from one team is 18. Newcomb would like to see the full 18 qualify.

"That's what we're going for," he said.

With White on the sidelines unable to dive, two divers have stepped up to answer the challenge.

Darbie Honey and Deidre May have impressed the coaching staff with their work ethic off the board.

"(Darbie) is working so hard. I'm very impressed with the steady improvement she's shown this year," Newcomb said.

May, recently back from a semester abroad, has picked up where she left off a year ago.

There is one dual meet left this weekend against University of New Hampshire. After that, it's on to the New England Championships and then the ECACs.

Bearcats chew up Minutemen, 76-74

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

CINCINNATI — LaZelle Durden hit four clutch free- throws in the last 13 seconds as Cincinnati overcame a second-half barrage by No. 8 Massachusetts, holding off the Minutemen 76–74 at the Myrl Shoemaker Center last night.

Durden, a 6-foot-2 junior from Toledo, Ohio, led the Bearcats, scoring 21 points, including 11 of those in the final two and a half minutes, allowing Coach Bob Huggins' club to avoid its first three-game losing streak since his first year at Cincinnati.

After Lou Roe free-throws cut the Bearcat lead to 63–58 with 2:05 left, Durden hit a 12-foot jumper in the lane to push the margin back to seven. Massachusetts didn't quit, though, as a Marcus Camby jam cut his team's deficit to five once again, 65–60.

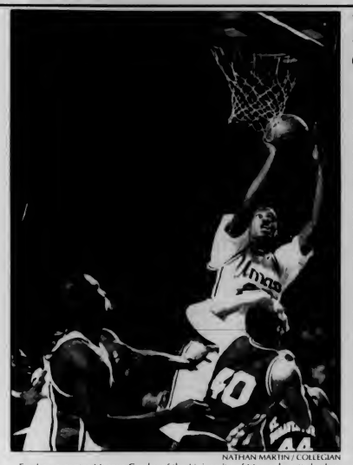
But Durden would drive the final nail in the coffin of the Minutemen, burying a three-pointer from the top of the key, forcing Massachusetts and Coach John Calipari into a "foul and pray" situation with 55 seconds to go. Durden's final four trips to the line made the Massachusetts' 14-point comeback all for naught.

Roe scrapped for 24 points and sophomore Donta Bright added 21, but it was not enough as the Minutemen were handed their third loss of the season, second in two weeks, on the road. Massachusetts drops to 15–3 on the season, while Cincinnati ups its record to 13–5.

The Minutemen suffered a more frightening loss, however, with 12:41 left to go in the contest when star guard Mike Williams collapsed crossing halfcourt from what Calipari termed "heat exhaustion."

The junior from Hartford, Conn., lay on the floor for several minutes before sitting up. He was able to leave the court on his own accord, visibly shaken. His vital signs returned to normal back in the locker room, but Williams was taken to the University Hospital observation.

Early indications from the team say that Williams is fine. Calipari said after the contest that Williams called from an ambulance to the arena, spoke with officials and asked if he could come back and play.



"Mike wanted to come back and play; that wasn't happening," Calipari said. "There is no basketball game important enough to me that I would put a young man back in without him being thoroughly tested."

The Bearcats jumped all over Massachusetts in the earlyu going after the Minutemen scored the first hoop of the game, running off 20 points to UMass' 4.

Dontonio Wingfield,effective early against the Minutemen, found himself taken out of the rest of the first half, scoring only one point in the final 12 minutes of the half, partly thanks to the interior defense by Roe, who seemed to give his all on one end of the floor. On the offensive end, however, Roe was lacking; he was only able to score four points, all from the charity stripe, while going 0-for-7 from the field in the first 20 minutes.

A big disadvantage for Massachusetts was the first half rebounding; the Minutemen were out-rebounded by Cincinnati 29–18. Trailing by 16 at the half, Minuteman Coach John Calipari fired up his team in an uncharacteristic way — according to some players, he was very calm.

"He was calm, but he was going crazy on certain players," said freshman Carmelo Travieso.

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

Freshman center Marcus Camby of the University of Massachusetts basketball team struggled from the floor, as did most of the Minutemen in their 76–74 loss at Cincinnati.

Bright played his best game of the year since Oklahoma in which he scored 28 points in a Minuteman victory. This time, however, Bright's effort was not enough.

"Coming out in the first half, we played tentative and they went to the glass, were able to get second-chance points," Bright said. "Second half, Coach Cal just told us to step it up, but we just came up short."

Player of the Game

Donta Bright Massachusetts

Bright, the 6–foot–6–inch sophomore forward from Baltimore, kept Massachusetts in the game early in the second half, making some key hoops. In only 24 minutes of action, Bright shot 7–10 from the field and enjoyed his best game as a scorer since registering 29 against Oklahoma in late November.

Why Massachusetts lost the game:

Like it did against George Washington on Saturday, Massachusetts was ice cold from the field to begin the game. After a short Bright Jump shot gave them an early 2–0 lead, the Minutemen missed their next seven shots and trailed by 16 points at intermission

Massachusetts needed the first 10 minutes of the second stanza to get back into the game, and just after it had cut the Bearcat lead to three (42–39) with 12:41 remaining, junior guard Mike Williams collapsed of exhaustion and had to be taken to a nearby hospital.

Still, the Minutemen took the lead and were up by four, but squandered it away and watched Cincinnati make its foul shots down the stretch. The Minutemen have now lost two of its last four games heading into this Sunday's Atlantic 10 showdown against Rhode Island.

Say What?

"I'm not worried about the points, I just wish we had the win."

— Massachusetts forward Donta Bright after scoring 21 points in a 76–74 loss to Cincinnati.

All–Star game sells out, too hip

Welcome to the annual All–Star edition of Between the Pipes.

The National Hockey League achieved its goal of making this year's All–Star game a low scoring affair. Although the Eastern Conference's 9–8 win was hardly a pitcher's duel, it had considerably more defense than last year's 16–6 football score.

BETWEEN THE PIPES Matt Vautour on the NHL

The positives from this year's game end here.

In recent times, every move the NHL has made has been an attempt to make the league more TV friendly and hip. The new teal and white Eastern Conference jerseys and purple and black Western uniforms are absolutely ridiculous and have "sell out" written all–over them. My insiders have uncovered a rumor that Anaheim head Quacker Michael Eisner is responsible for their design.

Once again, the NHL has rejected my proposal to include a Toughest Goon event as part of the skills competition. They did, however, add the Worst Haircut competition, where Jaromir Jagr edged out L.A. Coach Barry Melrose. A $1,000 check will be donated to Blaine Hair School in Jagr's name.

A suggestion for New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who brought his ever-present son Andrew with him to drop the ceremonial first puck: It's called day care. Look into it.

Canadiens' head coach Jacques Demers showed an appalling lack of insight by snubbing Cam Neely a place on the Eastern squad. The Bruins winger has averaged better than a goal a game. His 32 goals at the break were second only to Toronto's Dave Andreychuck, who has 38 in 21 more games.

Don't bet on NBC bringing back the pointless Roenick mic. The wireless microphone that was attached to the Blackhawk center picked up nothing other than random comments and indecipherable grunts.

Wayne Gretzky, commercial star. What's up with that?

The new playoff format will be ticking off some coaches in April. Teams like the Canadiens and the Bruins, who play a tougher schedule in the more competitive Northeast, would be seeded third and fifth behind weaker Atlantic division teams with inflated records from playing an easier schedule.

If the season ended today, John Vanbiesbrouck would be my choice for MVP. His brilliant goal-tending has allowed the offenseless expansion Florida Panthers to be in position for a playoff berth in their inaugural season.

Someone better give the islanders the Heimlich, because they are choking badly. (This insightless columnist picked them first.) The once fearsome Darius Kasparitis has done less damage than Casper the friendly ghost. Ron Hextall hasn't been the answer in net either. Without a dramatic turn-aröund, the Isles will be finding themselves on the golf course earlier than they'd like.

My hardworking interns have discovered that Bruin goalie Jon Casey has the leagues highest SGAA. (That's soft goals against average for those unfamiliar with the stat.) The Bruins' big wigs must know something I don't, because except for one season, Vincent Riendeau has been the Matt Young of hockey and the Bruins are touting him as their goal–tending savior.

A word of warning to Penguin opponents: Beware! Marlo will be back soon.

There is a certain sense of pride about covering the only sport where fans don't chant "Whoomp! There it is."

Friends & Rivals

Coaching pals love to compete

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

CINCINNATI — It's all praise out here, at least publicly. Not a bad word in this rust belt city on the ice chunk–filled Ohio River, which happened to host a fantastic college basketball game last night, a 76–74 Cincinnati win over No. 8 Massachusetts.

Of course, despite all of the gushing by two young coaches, despite the friendship and shared drinks after the game, there is as an intense a professional rivalry between Massachusetts' John Calipari and Cincinnati's Bob Huggins as can be found in college basketball.

The basketball battle between the nation's two hottest young coaches over the past few years has found no love lost. None. But somehow, the two old pals still love each other.

"Bobby Huggins is a great coach and a great guy," said Calipari. "We'll go out after the game and I'm sure I'll have to buy," he joked. "Bob Huggins has yet to spend a dollar of his own money. He's a cheapskate."

"John's a very good friend of mine, this was a tough game, but we leave the on–the–court stuff on the court," said Huggins. "Hey, I've known Cal since he was just a snot– nosed kid."

But while the two can exchange putdowns and remain friends, they are both far too savvy to not have wanted this one badly. Each wanted to get the upper hand on his chief rival. In the end, Huggins won out.

Talk all you want about Calipari and Kentucky's Rick Pitino or Huggins and his crosstown rival Pete Gillen at Xavier, the battle between Cal and Huggins (despite the Gillen–Huggins screaming match last week) blows them away.

"When you look at who are the two hottest coaches in college basketball, the two most desirable, they would be there, bang–bang, one and two," said Larry Donald, the editor of Basketball Times and a highly regarded expert of college basketball.

The two of them dress alike, they talk alike, they coach alike (emotional and vocal on the court, easy going off of it). In many ways they are clones. They are the new breed of coaches.

The two first met when a high school teammate of Calipari's, Joe Fryz, went to West Virginia and played with Huggins, then a junior in Morgantown.

"See you guys get it wrong when you call us both young," Calipari, 34, joked. "Bobby is much older than I am. He's about 45–50."

Huggins, 40, went on to a number of coaching jobs before landing at Cincinnati in 1989 and the two

Swim teams successful

• Injuries affect women

By MICHAEL REISS

Despite the temporary loss of three top–notch swimmers, University of Massachusetts women's swimming coach Bob Newcomb is upbeat and positive entering the final stretch of the season.

Sprinter Trish Evers, breaststroke specialist Jodi Walters, and diver Allison White are all injured at the moment, but are expected back soon.

Without the aforementioned three, the squad was edged by University of Connecticut 170–130 Tuesday night. Regardless of what the final score indicated, Newcomb was pleased with the team effort.

"We have a couple of key injuries," he said. "But overall, the rest of the team is swimming well."

Sarah Baker checked in with two first place finishes, 50– yard and 100-yard freestyle victories. Barbara Banks (200– yard backstroke), Jessica Griffith (100-yard backstroke), and Jessica Farley (200–yard freestyle) also scored first place finishes.

Earlier this week, Griffith was named New England Women's Intercollegiate Swimming & Diving Association Swimmer of the Week.

"The team is swimming well, but it's tough to lose these last two meets," said Newcomb of competition against UConn and Boston College.

Banks, a key ingredient to this year's team, continues to impress in the pool.

The undefeated streak for the University of Massachusetts men's swimming team grew to 10 last Saturday with a win over archrival University of Connecticut.

UMass defeated UConn by a score of 130–112.

The victory was particularly sweet for head coach Russ Yarworth.

"From a coaches' point of view, happiness is beating UConn," Yarworth said.

UConn had been posting excellent times all season and Yarworth was pleased with the way his team handled the meet.

"The guys worked so hard," Yarworth said. "Seeing it pay off was great."

The Minutemen were led by freshman Greg Menton, who won two events and set a new varsity, freshman and pool record in the 200–yard backstroke. Menton broke the record with a time of 1:52.74. Menton also won the 50–yard freestyle in 0:21.43.

Tim Milbert and Jose Santa turned in strong performances for UMass with each winning two events. Milbert won the 200–yard individual medley in 1:56.83 and the 200–yard breaststroke with a time of 2:10.30.

Santa won both the 100 and 200–yard freestyle races posting times of 0:47.62 and 1:45.16, respectively.

Ski teams head north

By HEATHER OLSEN
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts ski team is working hard to dispel the yth that it is a club. It is a varsity sport consisting of 15 men and 10 women. Training does not begin with the first snowfall, but starts months before with rigorous dryland training.

During winter session, the team competed in two meets. Despite injuries and other problems, the team held its own. The first meet was at home on Jan. 15 and Jan. 16. The women's team, despite missing three of its athletes, still managed to capture a third place finish in the slalom on Saturday.

Senior captain Beth Martin was the first UMass finisher, at seventh place. Other racers who scored for UMass were sophomore Danielle Kukene (13th), a Keene State transfer student, and senior Kim Lombardi (17th). UMass finished third behind Boston College and Plymouth State College in a nine–team field.

In the men's slalom, UMass recruit Tom Schaefer finished in a first place tie with PSC's Jeff Cuff (65:34). Following Schaefer for the UMass men were sophomore Brian Foster (19th), senior captain Tery Retelle (21st), junior Tyler Gannon (24th), and sophomore Brian Lenarczyk (25th). The men's slalom team finished a respectable third behind PSC and BC in a field of nine teams.

On Sunday, the men's and women's ski teams again headed for Berkshire East to compete in a GS. Despite temperatures reaching 40 degrees below zero, the UMass women's team placed fifth behind PSC, BC, Smith and Dartmouth. Martin (9th) finished first for UMass, followed by Kukene (20th) and Lombardi (21st).

In the men's GS, Schaefer (89:10) placed first ahead of PSC's Eric Price (92:27). The next UMass finisher was senior John Soglia (19th), followed by Lenarczyk (21st), freshman Aaron White (27th), Retelle (28th) and Gannon (29th). Despite Schaefer's three–second lead, BC beat UMass out of second place by a tenth of a second, with PSC capturing first.

On Jan. 22, the UMass ski team headed to Skutney Mountain. Although the women's team experienced some trouble with number one racer Martin having to hike the first run, they managed a fifth place finish in the slalom. Kukene had an excellent day, placing 10th overall and first for UMass. Lombardi (15th) was second for UMass, with Martin finishing third.

In the men's slalom, Schaefer again placed first and gave the men a three second lead over their opponents. Soglia came in second for UMass and 13th overall. Following Soglia was sophomore Paul Giammattei, who started 80th and finished 20th. White (23th) and Retelle (26th). UMass placed behind BC, PSC, and Dartmouth.

On Jan. 23, the women's team again placed fifth. Leading the giant slalom for UMass was Martin, who placed 12th, followed by Lombardi (17th) and sophomore Meredith Kotanchik (22nd).

Schaefer remained undefeated with a two-second advantage over PSC's Price. Soglia (11th), Retelle (23rd), Lenarczyk (27th) and Foster (29th) also scored for UMass. In a battle for second place, BC once again defeated UMass by a few seconds, with PSC finishing first.

The men's and women's ski team's next meet will be this weekend at Waterville Valley.

Women's gym meets with URI

By ANTHONY GUIDO

A great early season opportunity awaits the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team this weekend at Rhode Island. The Minutewomen are currently ranked 26th in the nation, and third in the region.

UMass is currently 1.2 points away from being a top 20 squad, virtually uncharted territory for the Minutewomen. First year coach David Kuzara is equally excited about their chances this weekend and for a breakthrough season.

"I expect a close, tough meet, but it's exactly what we need to really put us in a good position," Kuzara said.

According to Kuzara, the team has the best chance to move up in the standings now as the polls rarely change toward the end of the season.

Tara Schwartz has led the squad in the all–around, placing first in UMass' first two meets of the season (the New England Cup, and at Vermont). Senior Margaret Furtado has also had a couple of good meets and continues to train well.

"Everyone has trained very well the last two weeks. We feel great about these first two meets and should build strongly," Kuzara said.

"I'm trying to stress the team aspects to the squad and bring up the level of intensity. If all six gymnasts can focus as a team, we'll have a good weekend."

Kuzara and the new coaching staff have picked up the level of intensity at practice, and have continued to stress the point that college gymnastics is a team sport.

"We have changed the way we

Israeli forces to leave Gaza

By ALEXANDER G. HIGGINS
Associated Press

DAVOS, Switzerland — Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization will reach a final agreement "very soon" for Israeli withdrawl from the Gaza Strip and Jericho, PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat said Sunday.

Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres stopped short of any predictions on the arduous negotiations, but Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa told reporters that the PLO– Israel talks had cleared all the major hurdles.

"We would like to have a comprehensive peace," Peres told a privately organized gathering of political and business leaders from around the world. "Let's, Mr. Chairman, stop the follies of our own generation," Peres added in a speech that steered clear of specifics.

Peres told reporters, however, that many differences remained to be resolved.

Among major issues are security arrangements for the new Palestinian areas that will meet Israeli demands for keeping out terrorists while not infringing on the Palestinlan sense of sovereignty.

Moussa, who has been actively involved in the negotiations here, joined Arafat in taking an upbeat view of prospects. He announced that he expected both sides in Cairo soon to sign their accord, which he said was almost final.

Later he told reporters the signing would be within 10 days.

"This really is the final stage," he said, adding that all the major issues had been resolved and only some "finessing" remained. The issue of security was resolved by an agreement that would keep Israeli agents from being visible, Moussa said, apparently referring to suggestions that they would be behind one–way mirrors.

Israel Radio cited Egyptian sources as saying the only remaining issue was the size of Jericho, and that there would be joint Israeli–Palestinian patrols in Gaza, apparently referring to securing roads to Jewish settlements.

After both sides reported a good start Saturday night and possible agreement by midday Sunday, the Israelis started emphasizing the many areas of disagreement that must be addressed before Israel will agree to pull its troops out of the areas to be ceded to the Palestinians.

"We are on our way to bypass all obstacles which had been raised in the last two weeks ... to have very soon, very soon the final agreement to start directly the implementation of the peace agreements," Arafat told the forum.

"We are still working," Peres told reporters

Both leaders told the business leaders of the need for investment in the Middle East to build a stable economy that will enable peace to endure. Arafat said the Palestinian areas would have a free–market economy, and a U.S. official noted that Washington was inviting business leaders to a discussion Feb. 7–8 to promote investment in the Middle East.

New WMUA programming lets students, faculty speak

Students will now be able to speak their opinions and discuss issues on a new radio talk show called UMass Talks, presented by WMUA, 91.1 FM.

On Feb. 1, Alan Willcox, a senior history major, will begin producing and hosting the show.

Willcox said he is hoping to bring another source of news to the University of Massachusetts campus.

"WMUA will be broadcasting a news and talk show dedicated to issues related to UMass, its undergraduate and graduate students, student government, faculty, administration and the surrounding University community," Willcox said.

> "We produced this show in the hope of encouraging dialogue and increasing awareness of the many issues facing the University community."
> — Alan Willcox host of 'UMass Talks'

The program will run every Tuesday from 6 to 7 p.m. Some major issues which the show will focus on are news and issues from the UMass campus.

"People will be able to call in and speak to the guest and discuss their views on the issues being talked about," he said.

One of the first guests on the show will be Chancellor David K. Scott.

Student Government Association leaders will also be speaking during the first week of the show.

"We will also be talking to someone from the affiliative action office on the issue of disabilities on campus," Willcox said.

Willcox also said they will be looking to raise up a staff of student volunteers.

A meeting will be held on Thursday. Feb. 5 at 5:30 p.m., for any students who want to become involved with the new show.

Willcox is hoping to get many people involved with the program because he is graduating and wants the show to continue next year.

Training will be provided for those who want to become involved in the show, but the workers will not be paid.

"We produced this show in the hope of encouraging dialogue and increasing awareness of the many issues facing the University community," he said.

The program is hoping to cover issues showing both sides of the topic.

All views will be represented on the show when it is being discussed.

"We will have open phone lines and will accept any comments made during the program," he said.

If students want to be on the show or suggest any topics they want to be discussed they can call the station at 545– 2876.

"WMUA cannot fix problems alone, but it can, as a community broadcaster, empower others to face common problems together. So, we're depending on you to make this work, to make a difference," Willcox said.

Video monitors receive mixed response from students

By JUSTIN DOYLE
Collegian Staff

When visiting the Franklin Dining Commons, eating is just one of your choices. Last semester televisions were installed in the dining commons in the Central Residential Area.

The Laser Video Company brought several televisions into the Franklin Dining Commons for entertainment. The televisions play music videos which can be selected from a main terminal.

"There are about three hundred videos students can choose from," said Richard Rossi the director of food services at the University of Massachusetts. "We are trying to provide entertainment at the dining common."

The televisions met a mixed response last semester, which caused the removal of three monitors. A verbal survey was taken and the results were taken into account.

"The survey involved two to three hundred students," said Rossi. "About 60 to 70 liked the televisions, approxiately 60 disliked them, and 40 to 50 students didn't care."

"I received a comment from a student who ate at the Franklin Dining Common," said Rossi. "He told me that because the dorms are so noisy and congested, many students enjoy socializing at the DC. The televisions seemed to disturb this. I took this into advisement."

The televisions are used not only to entertain, but also as an advertising tool. The monitors can be used as an information source to a large group of students.

"I want to work on using the televisions to advertise," said Rossi. "Different groups on campus can use them to get information out to students."

Advertisement was one of the main objectives of the televisions. They give the music companies valuable information.

"Laser Video Installed the monitors for free," said Rossi. "They use the videos to find out what the students are listening to."

Colleges all over the country have put video screens in their eating areas using this concept. Some have tried charging students with little success.

"Some schools have charged a dollar to choose videos, said Rossi. "This isn't feasible. Students aren't willing to spend their money to watch videos."

The video system is still going through the trial process. If enough students complain about the televisions, they will be removed before summer begins, according to Rossi.

"Personally, I like it," said Richard Chamberlain a first– year student who ate at Franklin last semester. "It gives everyone something to watch while they are eating."

Mentally ill now able to testify, says legislation

By JONATHAN YENKIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Joseph Buonomo was horrified when his mentally retarded son said he had been sexually assaulted. But Buonomo says his son was victimized again — by a criminal justice system that refused to take the case.

"I was extremely frustrated that we couldn't see justice brought to the case," he said. "I wasn't about to roll over and play dead."

Buonomo launched a campaign to change the system and now courtroom doors are starting to open wider for the retarded in Massachusetts. The state recently enacted a law — described by supporters as the first in the country — which will make it easier for the retarded to participate in court.

The law authorizes courts to use alternative methods to take testimony from mentally retarded people, both for determining the person's competency and for presenting the testimony at a trial. For instance, testimony could be taken by videotape or in the judge's chamber. A person close to the witness, such as a relative or counselor, could sit next to him and offer comfort.

"Just because someone is mentally retarded, it shouldn't bar them from telling what happened to them," said Mary Beth Heffernan, an assistant district attorney from Middlesex County. Heffernan served on a state task force that studied the access of mentally retarded citizens to the criminal justice system.

Alan Abeson, executive director of The Arc, a national advocacy group for the retarded, said Massachusetts had taken a pioneering step with its law.

Gillooly points finger at Harding

By BOB BAUM
Associated Press

PORTLAND, Ore. — Tonya Harding's ex–husband decided to divulge the champion skater's role in the attack on Nancy Kerrigan after authorities convinced him Harding had turned on him first, his brother told The Associated Press on Sunday.

Jeff Gillooly said his brother's attorney, Ron Hoevet, tried to convince his client Harding had turned on him, but Jeff Gillooly didn't believe it until he received a 46–page deposition the skater had given the FBI.

"Whatever implications are made against him, he has to rebut," John Gillooly said "If it involves implicating her, that's probably the crux of it."

He said Harding told his brother shortly after she talked to the FBI that she had said nothing to link him to the plot to attack Kerrigan.

Kerrigan was struck with a metal baton above the right knee after a workout Jan. 6 as she prepared for the U.S. Figure Skating Championship in Detroit. Harding went on to win the championship.

Hoevet confirmed John Gillooly's account, telling The Oregonian, "Jeff would have fallen on his sword for Tonya if Tonya had told him the truth. But she didn't." Hoevet did not return telephone calls Sunday from the AP.

As expected, Harding was on the list of 12 athletes submitted by the U.S. Figure Skating Association to the U.S. Olympic Committee Sunday as participants in the Winter Games, which begin Feb. 12 in Lillehammer, Norway.

However, the list was submitted "with the

I think my roommate has an eating disorder. How can I be sure? What should I do?
I think my sister is anorexic and she isn't getting any help. How can I convince her to see a professional? Who should I suggest...Where should she go?
I'm concerned about my friend who has bulimia. She says it's under control, but I don't think it is. I'm really afraid...What can I do to help?
If you're concerned about someone who you know or suspect is struggling with an eating disorder, come to this informal workshop to explore how you can help and cope with these issues.

understanding that replacements in the women's competition could be named up to Feb. 21," association spokesperson Kristin Matta said.

The women's figure skating competition is to begin Feb. 23.

The USFSA also submitted the names of 10 replacement skaters, including 13-year-old Michelle Kwan, who would take the place of Harding if she were dropped from the Olympic team.

The USOC is to submit the list of skaters to the Olympic Organizing Committee in Lilliehammer by Monday.

Jeff Gillooly testified for two hours Saturday before the Multnomah County grand jury investigating the case. The grand jury apparently did not meet on Sunday.

Norm Frink, Multnomah County district attorney, said Sunday he didn't expect any indictments to be issued anytime soon.

Jeff Gillooly reportedly cut a deal in which he will plead guilty to one count of racketeering and receive a two-year prison sentence and be fined $100,000. Hoever said he expects his client to make a statement and hold a news conference Monday or Tuesday, a strong indication he plans to enter his plea by then.

John Gillooly believes his brother's public statement would set off a chain of events.

"This will come to a head very quickly and will be resolved once Jeff makes his statement," John said.

Harding met with the FBI for more than 10 hours on Jan. 18.

Hillel helps to reforest Israeli land

By JON MORRIS
Collegian Correspondent

The Hillel House is currently running a tree drive in celebration of Tu B'Shvat Seder, a Jewish holiday celebrating trees, nature and ecology.

According to Robin Novick, president of the Student Alliance for Israel and a Jewish National Fund activist, the drive was suggested to the Hillel organization by the Jewish National Fund and will continue through Feb. 9.

The trees are $10, and will be planted in Israel to help in the Reforestation project. Each person that purchases a tree will receive a certificate from Hillel.

The drive is being coordinated by Novick. Anyone seeking more information or interested in purchasing a tree can contact the Hillel House.

The Jewish National Fund is an international organization based in Israel. The Tu B'Shvat Seder celebrates the first fruit.

The Student Alliance for Israel will also be holding a telecommunications conference with Shimon Peres, the Israeli Foreign Minister and the chief architect of the Israeli– Palestinian peace accord.

Peres will be speaking at Harvard University and the speech will be transmitted live to the University of Massachusetts campus by satellite.

Peres will answer questions from Harvard students and any UMass students that attend. The event will be held in Herter Hall room 19 from 12–1 p.m. Refreshments will be served.

On Feb. 16, the Alliance will sponsor Yossir Omat, who is scheduled to speak in the Campus Center about the peace process. All students are encouraged to attend.

All those who would like information or are interested in joining the Student Alliance for Israel are encouraged to attend a meeting at 5 p.m. on Thursdays or call Novick at the Hillel House at 549–1710.

"As long as there's been a criminal justice system, there's been an inappropriate treatment of mentally retarded people in it," he said.

But in recent years, this issue has gained more attention, pushed forward partly by the Americans with Disabilities Act, which requires state services such as courts to be more accessible.

While many people assume the law deals with physical disabilities, the American Bar Association is urging the justice system to make adjustments for mental disabilities as well, said Kathryn McCarty, a specialist on disability law with the ABA.

On another front, the National Judicial College, a Nevada institution that provides training for judges, is developing a program to teach judges to better deal with defendants, victims and witnesses who are mentally retarded.

"There has been increasing activity in the last five years because the justice area is understood to be the last frontier," said Ruth Luckasson, an authority on the subject and professor of special education at the University of New Mexico.

Experts say retarded people must be treated differently in court for a variety of reasons. The courtroom setting can be intimidating, making it difficult to testify. Defendants who are mentally retarded may give answers that they think the questioner wants to hear, which could implicate them erroneously.

In 1989, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in a capital punishment case that courts could consider mental retardation as a mitigating factor. But the court also upheld the constitutionality of executing retarded defendants.

In another major case, a Superior Court judge in New Jersey ruled that a mentally retarded woman was competent to testify against three men who sexually assaulted her with a baseball bat. The men were convicted last year.

But advocates say too often, mentally retarded victims have not been able to bring their attackers to court because they have been deemed incompetent.

That was the case with Buonomo, of Middleton, whose 40-year-old son, Paul, alleged he was sexually assaulted by a staff worker at a group home.

A cure for the winter blahs

Brooke C. Wheeler

Oh, those winter blahs. How does one get through these gray days? One method I recommend is to enter into seasonal denial and begin spring cleaning in January.

This January I decided, for a change of pace, to begin spring cleaning on my face.

The first step was to allow myself to be accosted by one of those red–taloned, be–smocked, unblinking creatures that swoop and circle the makeup counters of my neighborhood department store. This consisted of simply entering the makeup department and standing still until one of them alighted to my side. Her name was Sherlinda Mae, and she had big plans for me.

Delighted to have a Real Live One in her grasp, she began our session with a generous compliment.

"What a marvelous pink color you have in your cheeks' Is it natural?"

"I believe it's windburn."

She leaned in for a closer look and I felt her eyes appraise the landscape of my face inch–by–inch in a laserlike scan.

"Hmm. Your pores are quite large."

Ignorant of the consequences of this feature I was prompted instantly to remark, "Why, thank you!"

Encouraged, she began an impressive, if not suicide– inducing, diatribe on the futility of fighting blackheads when one possesses such cavernous pores.

"A deep cleansing masque" was her expert diagnosis, and with long, red–tipped fingers she plucked a large green tube from her nearby arsenal and presented it to me with authority.

"Are you familiar with our system? Cucumber, rosemary, peppermint. It peels off when dry and your skin feels fresh and cleansed."

In the spirit of spring cleaning, I perched on a tall stool in the middle of the bustling store, tilted my head back awkwardly and became mild entertainment for vagrant shoppers in purchasing ennui.

Sherlinda Mae glopped the green jello–like material onto my unsuspecting cheeks, and then we waited for it to "set." The Facial Fascist took this opportunity to outline the System of their products, the Skin Regimen one must adhere to in order to attain Perfect Skin, and the various self–sacrifices involved.

A timer dinged nearby, and like so many concrete foundations of architectural monoliths in so many cities that span the globe, my face had "set."

Out came the dexterous red talons, and in one sudden, frightening motion from forehead to chin, the masque disappeared from my face and landed in a green rubbery heap in a trash can at my feet. I gasped out my next of kin and my eyes watered involuntary rivulets down my face.

I blindly groped for the mirror on the counter, frantic to see if any skin had been left behind. A red, bewildered face looked back at me. Something looked different.

"I think I'm missing some freckles," I whispered hoarsely, eyeing the trash can nervously.

"Your skin is fresh and new! Doesn't it feel invigorated?"

"I look like a radiation victim."

"Your pores have been cleaned and evacuated!"

"I think I'm bleeding."

"If you wish to include the masque in your personal System, the cost is $46.50."

"Does it come with a hari–kari knife and pins to stick in my eyes?"

She smiled patiently at me. She had dealt with insubordinates before — I was the amateur here.

"It only hurts the first time." Now where had I heard that before? "You need to energize your skin and increase circulation."

"Maybe I'll encourage it to get more exercise, but I'm not real keen on $46.50 worth of masochistic..."

"The rest of our System," she interrupted, "is 100 percent natural and gentle to your skin. None of it hurts." Was that pity I saw behind the blue mascara? No, no, I mustn't let my guard down. I knew what was at stake here. I wiped the last of the tears from my face and snuffled.

"Sherlinda Mae, you've been most helpful..."

"And which of our custom–selected products will you be purchasing today?"

"Today, I'm afraid, my most pressing purchase will be some over–the–counter painkillers. But I will most certainly keep you in mind (as I apply the ice pack)."

Patronizing Smile Number Five.

"Well, here's your customized list of Products from our System. When you come back, just use my name as your Personal Consultant." As she spoke, she clicked several red talons against the top of the glass case beside her and scoped out new clients over my shoulder. I knew it was time to go.

I had won this battle, but the war waged on as Client #2 took my vacated seat. I walked away, mildly triumphant, credit card still sheathed safely in my wallet. Behind me, I heard it start again — "What stunning cheekbones..." — but I was already out the door.

The cold air hit my "new" skin, and I winced. Sometimes victory hurts, but I'm no martyr, and I would survive. Small pores are overrated anyway.

Brooke C. Wheeler is a Collegian columnist with fresh, clean pores.

Cold makes matters worse

Marni E. Helfner

Welcome back to UMass, winter and all the accompanying dangers. Not that UMass is a dangerous place, but combined with winter, this campus becomes a cold–weather version of Dante's Inferno.

I moved to New England because I thought I liked cold weather. I knew it would get cold, but this is ridiculous.

For those of us who were here for wintersession, traction became a thing of the past as most of Amherst and Noho was iced over with about two inches of ice and slush (I totalled my car on it). Even though those two days of warm weather melted the roads, it didn't melt UMass.

Since last Monday, I've slipped a dozen times on the ice and once fell flat on my behind. That was on Wednesday, between the two red poles between Machmer and the Tower Library, and on Thursday I saw two other people slip there.

The University can afford some salt and sand, it really wouldn't kill them. The parking lots adjacent to Whitmore are well–plowed and sanded, and I'm sure the Chancellor's driveway is clear. What about the rest of us?

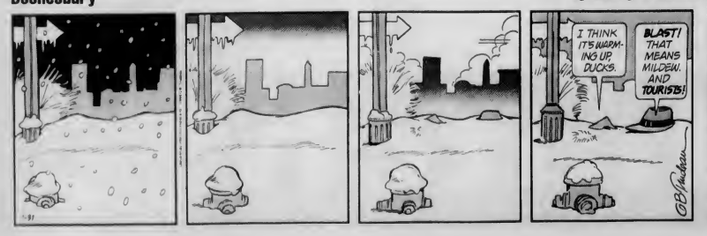
How about that lovely noise echoing throughout campus? You know, the one when rubber–soled sneakers pick up the slush and then step down into the slush again. That squeak that makes the hair stand up on the back of your neck. Of course, once inside a building, you can't get the snow out of the treads and you slip all over the floors.

Oh yes, those lovely floors. No one has cleaned them in the past five years, and when wet snow hits the built–up sand and salt, a thin, wet layer of grime spreads everywhere. If you don't slip on it, you're sure to put your bag down into it.

Going outside is another treat — you know that instant headache you get from when you go from semi–warm to icy cold. Some universities in the northern part of the United States have underground tunnel systems from building to building. If UMass would just spend some money on tunnels instead of deputy chancellors, everyone could be a little bit warmer.

The area by the Campus Center was ripped up last semester and several trees were removed. Why? Not to build a tunnel, but to improve the heating system. That explains why the room in Bartlett where my wintersession class was held had either no heating or had air conditioning that wouldn't shut off.

It also explains why McNamara, in Sylvan, has one side with virtually no heat, and the other side is about 85 degrees. I sleep with my window open, otherwise it gets too hot. It's cold out, but I'd rather have a small draft than sweat to death.



Housing Services' solution to the problem was to give the students on the cold side of the building space heaters. I saw one and immediately thought, "firetrap." They look like they were made in about 1968; banged up, rusty in a few spots and have coils that are red–hot. The heaters sit on the floor, and most people have carpets. If someone were to tip one over, it could start a fire.

And, as if things weren't bad enough, everytime more than one heater is running at a time, a circuit breaker trips, and then there's not only no heat, but no electricity either.

But then again there are all those good things to look forward to at UMass: D.C. food, no used books at the Textbook Annex, the oh–so–prompt PVTA buses, long lines at the Bursar's office, the Registrar's office, the Financial Aid office...

The Clintons' latest scandal

So just what's the deal with Whitewater?

It's one of those words on the nightly news that everyone is supposed to understand and fear, yet no one really seems to know what it is. And with good reason — what has been in the news lately about the newest Clinton scandal is often more rumor than fact.

What's really known about Whitewater right now is this: When Bill Clinton became governor of Arkansas, James McDougal was appointed to an advisory position. A couple of years later, McDougal — outside of his government role — asked Clinton if he would be interested in investing in a new business venture called the Whitewater Development Corporation.

Later on, McDougal's Madison Guaranty Bank collapsed, as did hundreds of other S&Ls across the country, because of poor management and some illegal acts.

What is being charged against Clinton is this: first, that $50,000 was diverted from Madison to Clinton's 1984 gubernatorial campaign; and second, that Clinton used his clout as governor to help keep Madison alive while it was collapsing, despite McDougal's improper actions. Hillary Rodham Clinton is also accused of using her marriage to Clinton to help McDougal save the bank.

The first charge can probably be rejected outright — Bill Clinton is far too good a politician to think that stealing fifty grand would go unnoticed. Even if he felt he could get away with it, he would not have risked his presidential ambitions on it. As for the second charge, it is hard to prove. As it now stands, Clinton is guilty only by association.

So this should have been a minor scandal, not even as big a story as Travelgate or the $200 haircut. And it would be nice to be able to wipe the slate clean and say that then– Gov. Clinton didn't do anything wrong.

Whitewater should have been a minor scandal, not even as big a story as Travelgate or the $200 haircut. And it would be nice to be able to wipe the slate clean and say that then– Gov. Clinton didn't do anything wrong.

But he did do something wrong — after becoming president.

Peter J. Orvetti

But he did do something wrong — after becoming president.

In the past, I have been one of Clinton's strongest defenders, and I still am. I think that, in his heart, Bill Clinton is a very decent man, and I also think that most of his actions as president thus far have been for the ultimate good of the country.

I have never deluded myself about his political character, however. Clinton has always been and will always be a political player, someone who is ready to sacrifice both ethics and principles to get ahead. No other recent president has handed out pork–barrel prizes to win votes in Congress like Clinton, or been as willing as Clinton to let an advisor or Cabinet member take the blame for a mistake that was really his own fault.

What Clinton did wrong in Whitewater is that he tried to cover it up. During the 1992 campaign, when it came up, he wouldn't talk about it. On the day that investigators were coming to fetch the file from Vince Foster's office, Foster shot himself in the head and the file was carried off and hidden by Clinton aides. Clinton angrily refused to comment on Whitewater for weeks, and he even kept Attorney General Janet Reno from opening up a full investigation for as long as possible.

No, Clinton did not commit a major S&L crime or defraud the government. What he did wrong was that he tried to hide what he did do from the public. He should come clean.

Because of his cover–up, Clinton has made Whitewater look like a major crime that could bring down his presidency. Who knows? Maybe it is; maybe he has a very good reason to try to cover it up.

And now that there is finally a special prosecutor on the case, we'll all soon know.

Peter J. Orvetti is a student at Hampshire College.

Letters to the Editor

The reality behind the Activities Fee

To the Editor:

I am responding to the editorial "Bursar's Office misrepresents fee [Collegian, Jan. 27]." I want to show my support for the Collegian and solidify that your editorial was 100 percent correct. While it is true that the Collegian and the Index do not receive any Student Activity Fee–based money, it is also true that both these student organizations are part of the Student Activity Trust Fund.

The Student Activity Fee is the $42 each undergraduate full–time student pays per semester, or $84 per year. This money helps to pay for the PVTA bus system, area governments, the spring concert, and many diverse student groups here on campus. Some of our student organizations are used as models for other student groups at other universities across the country.

None of the monies accrued from this $84 fee are used to fund the Collegian or the Index. Both of these organizations have created a way to become self–sufficient; that is, they pay for all their expenses through revenue they generate. What about student business co–ops, i.e. People's Market (which has the best coffee) and residential snack bars? These organizations are also self–sufficient.

The administration perceives the Collegian and the Index in a different light. Almost all student–used facilities on campus have individual trust funds and set a fee, approved by the Board of Trustees, with which to operate their particular facility. Examples are fees such as the Athletic Fee, the Fine Arts Center Fee, and the Disguised Tuition Fee... I mean the Curriculum Fee.

The administration believes that because the Collegian and the Index are in the Student Activities Trust Fund, and every student pays a Student Activities Fee which generates money for the Trust Fund, then the Collegian and the Index must get funded by that $84 fee. This thinking by the Bursar's Office is completely false. The Collegian and the Index do not use Student Activity Fee money.

This assumption by the administration in Whitmore is the result of the outstanding communication they have with their student organizations.

Another example of this incredible communicative relationship between Whitmore and student organizations is evident in the University's plan for the campus in the year 2000. The Student Union and Campus Center, the center for student activity and co–curricular learning, were not even included in this report.

But I am glad that we have those two new, dynamite administrators. Maybe now the Campus Center and Student Union will be in future future reports for the campus.

Send us your letters

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian welcomes and encourages letters to the editor. When writing, please type your letter and keep it to a maximum of 400 words. We would much rather print several concise letters in the limited space we have available.

All letters should include a name, address and phone number (for verification purposes only). Students should also include their year and major. The Collegian reserves the right to edit submissions for grammar, clarity and length.

The Editorial/Opinion page will occasionally print guest columns, but arrangements must be made in advance. If you feel you have a unique perspective on an issue of general interest, contact the Ed/Op staff before you submit anything longer than a standard letter.

You may send submissions to the Editorial/Opinion page via U.S. mail or campus mail c/o the Collegian, 113 Campus Center, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003.

To deliver your letter in person, bring it to the Collegian offices, located in the Campus Center basement, on the opposite end from the ATM's.

Jim Henry entertains at Black Sheep

By HENRY BRIER
Collegian Correspondent

Local musician Jim Henry performed last Saturday night at the Black Sheep Cafe in Amherst Center. Nearly 60 of his enthusiasts filled the eatery to capacity.

This smaller–sized audience provided him the opportunity to interact with those seated closer to the front, however, he also managed to identify with those seated in the back, which seemed to reduce the size of the hall.

When asked what he thought of playing the smaller circuits, Henry responded, "I love it. The smaller places are great because they make it more intimate, which maintains my interest.

"Part of what's nice about playing locally is that I know all the cards are stacked for me. I enjoy seeing familiar faces."

His gentle and soothing voice, coupled with the honest sound emitted by his guitar, all complemented by the warm audience reception, conveyed very well the secure mood and local roots. Even his guitar, a handmade Nickerson, was crafted by a local artisan.

"What a mellow show," stated Sam Rulli, one of Henry's newly–found and hooked fans. "He has this way of gripping and then increasing my interest."

Henry had previously been the lead guitarist for the Sundogs, a local band, but for the past two years, he has been on his own. Last year he released his first album, Into the Blue, available on Coaster Records.

He recently returned from touring upstate New York, where he played different tracks off his production for similarly–sized audiences.

Henry is considered "a musicians' musician;" a singer, songwriter and guitar player. Although touted as a "New Folk Singer," Henry's repertoire consists of blues (and catchy) variations.

He opened Saturday with "Summer Blues," a song he had written which told of the discontentment he found in the blistering summer heat.

Shortly thereafter, Henry played his renowned single "'Til the Siren Blows Again," a song chock–full of personal reminiscences. He based it on his experience growing up in Kansas, where tornados often struck, leaving him and the other members of the community on edge.

This single brought him much success in The Acoustic Underground, a musical competition held in Boston. Approximately 400 musicians partook in this contest, which was thinned to 10 finalists, where Henry earned second place. The finalists produced a compilation album which consisted of each artist's song. For this album, Henry recorded "'Til the Siren Blows Again."

The atmosphere was very calm and laid–back during this selection, which swayed toward the folk–fringe of the blues, undoubtedly due to the poetic and profound lyrics.

Henry managed to personalize several of his songs, which facilitated his easing into "The Aardvark Song," the humorous lyrics of which also got a warm reception.

Henry credited Richard Thompson as being one of his prime influences for his music, especially the title cut from Into the Blue. Thompson is an English rocker from the late '60s who founded a band called The Airport Convention. He is best known for his songwriting and guitar playing.

Henry has won numerous flatpicking contests over the years, which was evident in his next song, "Maggie," an instrumental, was honorably named after a visiting dog who displayed a unique intelligence. It started in a slower manner and gradually picked up, which seemed to be expressive of the golden retriever's personality. The more upbeat tempo was jumpy, restless and frisky, yet consistently steady until towards the end when it tapered off and returned to a more lackadaisical flow.

The majority of the songs from the first set molded the audience into a somber mood. At one point, Henry asked them if they needed any coffee, as he knew he was calming.

Upon returning for the second set, Henry played another cut from his album. He dedicated "Two Hands on the Wheel" to the Mass. State Motor Vehicle Department.

This was a great way to open the set, as it reminded us not to underestimate. His flatpicking talent set the faster–paced mode, and kept us on the edge of our seats.

Henry then brought out Craig Eastman, a fiddle player who had been a co–member of the Sundogs. The two have been playing together since 1979, so their styles were complementary.

"Whiskey Before Breakfast" was an instrumental version, which seemed improvisational, yet it meshed well. They then performed "One Horse Town", Henry's song, which had won him first place in a Wyoming songwriter's contest. This song is on Henry's album, but performed live and with the fiddle, it was dimensionalized.

A Cajun tune appropriately found its way into the repertoire. "Louisiana Girl" was written by Henry and well– received by the crowd.

There seemed to be a static current emanating throughout the hall, originating from center stage, where these two highly–talented musicians were situated. They also played "Drowsy Maggie," yet another tribute to the canine. This tune tapered off to a slow ending, which was indicative of Maggie during her more lethargic moods.

On the whole, their music was very improvisational. They worked each other into faster tempos, only to stimulate the audience as they consistently changed modes.

The songs often started slowly, in a lazy manner, but were eventually drawn out and expanded. The general theme they kicked around was relaxation with stimulation, which grabbed the audience's attention.

The Black Sheep Cafe, 79 Main St., Amherst, features night performances every weekend. All shows are BYOB. Free live music is also provided every Sunday Brunch, 10:30 a.m.–12:30p.m. Call 253–0679 for more information.

Dude of Life entertains at Iron Horse

Phish drummer John Fishman will accompany

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

Tell me truthfully, do you know the Dude of Life? If you do, you're probably a faithful follower of cult heros Phish. If you don't, well perhaps it's time you said hello to one of the more enigmatic personalities in the music industry today.

The Dude's affiliation with Phish is an ongoing one which he has always kept under tight wraps. Appearing on stage with the band, the Dude would adorn himself in eccentric attire and accompany his disguises with rubber chickens or lawnmowers. But the Dude isn't a freak, he's a vocal talent.

> "the Dude would adorn himself in eccentric attire and accompany his disguises with rubber chickens or lawnmowers."

And he's taken his act on the road. The announcement of the Dude of Life's presence at Iron Horse in Northampton was enough to justify the addition of a second performance.

So why is it that a call to the Dude's booking agents provoked some mystery as to what exacty the Dude does? The only press uncovered on the Dude was a feeble release which said little other than his backup band is highly accomplished. But if an artists support was any reason to see a show, the Dude would sellout six shows.

On the drums will be Phish's own Jon Fishman, a multi– talented musician whose work ranges from Phish's grooves to jazz beats.

Guitarist Dan Archer owns and engineers Archer studios in Vermont. Bassist Aaron Hersey and keyboardist Phil Abair have played with a massive handful of New England bands for almost 20 years.

The catalog of music that the Dude has written over the past decade and a half is extensive and quite impressive. If credentials are needed, consider that the Dude penned the vocals for such classic Phish tunes as "Suzie Greenberg" and "Dinner and a Movie."

The Dude of Life's on–stage vocal repertoire and visual appearance remain a constant source of entertainment but one only need look to his past credits and respect within the industry to find a reason to see a first rate show of extended jams and, for those not in the know, probably a bit of mystery.

The Dude and friends will play at the Iron Horse in Northampton tomorrow night (Tues. Feb. 1) at 7 & 10 p.m. Tickets are $8.50 in advance and available at the Northampton Box Office or by calling 586–8686.

The Economics of the Citibank Classic Visa card. How no annual fee, student discounts and Price Protection create upward growth. A variety of factors have been suggested as contributing to the economic growth of students, including (1) more lottery winners between the ages of 18 and 22, (2) a 37% increase on earnings from bottle and can returns, (3) more students doubling earnings in the lightning round of game shows, and (4) the Citibank Classic Visa® card. It's this last one, however, that affects most students. ¶ The Citibank Classic Visa card offers immediate savings to student cardmembers. You can now receive the Citibank Classic card with No Annual Fee. You can capitalize on a $20 Airfare Discount for domestic flights,[1] a low variable interest rate of 15.4%;[2] as well as savings on mail order purchases, sports equipment, music and magazines. One might even have enough savings to reinvest in a CD or two (the musical kind, of course). ¶ On the way to the record store, or any store for that matter, take stock of the 3 services concerned with purchases made on the Citibank Classic card. Citibank Price Protection assures one of the best prices. See the same item advertised in print for less, within 60 days, and Citibank will refund the difference up to $150.[3] Buyers Security℠ can cover these investments against accidental damage, fire or theft (ordinarily causes for Great Depressions) for 90 days from the date of purchase.[3] And Citibank Lifetime Warranty℠ can extend the warranty for the expected service life of eligible products up to 12 years.[4] ¶ But perhaps the features which offer the best protection are your eyes, your nose, your mouth, etc.—all featured on The Photocard, the credit card with your photo on it. Carrying it can help prevent fraud or any hostile takeover of your card. (Insiders speculate that it makes quite a good student ID, too.) Even if one's card is stolen, or perhaps lost, The Lost Wallet℠ Service can replace your card usually within 24 hours. ¶ So never panic. As we all know, panic, such as in the Great Panics of 1837, 1857 and 1929 can cause a downswing in a market. But with 24-hour Customer Service, there's no reason for it. A question about your account is only an 800 number away. (Panic of the sort experienced the night before Finals is something else again.) ¶ Needless to say, building a credit history with the support of such services can only be a boost. You're investing in futures—that future house, that future car, etc. And knowing the Citibank Classic Visa card is there in your wallet should presently give you a sense of security, rare in today's—how shall we say?—fickle market. ¶ To apply, call. Students don't need a job or a cosigner. And call if you'd simply like your photo added to your regular Citibank Classic Visa card. Here's the number: 1-800-CITIBANK, extension 19. (1-800-248-4226). ¶ The Law of Student Supply and Demand states, "If a credit card satisfies more of a student's unlimited wants and needs, while reducing the Risk Factor in respect to limited and often scarce resources—with the greatest supply of services and savings possible—then students will demand said credit card." So, demand away—call.

No known picture of Washington smiling exists. Economists believe Washington was unhappy because he felt he could have received a better deal on our supplies. If he used a Citibank Classic Visa card, he would have been assured of getting the best price and probably would have been happier (Artist's rendering of how he would have appeared on the dollar).

Not just Visa. Citibank Visa.

Monarch Notes® Version: The Citibank Classic Visa card will be there for you with no annual fee, a low rate and special student discounts... so your own economy will be more like a boom than a bust. Call 1-800-CITIBANK, ext. 19 (1-800-248-4226).

Chief's show fitting tribute for McHale

By HOWARD ULMAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — On the day Kevin McHale's number was retired, longtime teammate Robert Parish had 14 points and 17 rebounds as the Boston Celtics won their seventh straight game, 106–94 over the Phoenix Suns yesterday.

The Celtics broke open the game after the halftime ceremony in which No. 32 was raised to the rafters on a banner. They turned a 55–45 intermission lead into an 80–58 advantage with 2:26 left in the third quarter.

The Suns, playing without injured players Charles Barkley, Kevin Johnson and Danny Ainge, never led. But they drew within 98–90 with 2:32 left as Cedric Ceballos had nine straight Phoenix points.

The turning point came on Phoenix's next possession. Dan Majerle missed two 3-pointers and Parish rebounded. He fired a 50-foot pass to Sherman Douglas, who went in for an easy layup and a 100–90 lead with 1:51 remaining.

Dino Radja had 21 points and Dee Brown 15 for Boston, enjoying its longest winning streak of the season.

The Suns, 4–7 after going 24–6 in their first 30 games, were led by Ceballos with 27 points and Majerle with 16. Oliver Miller just missed a triple–double with 10 points, 11 rebounds and nine assists.

The Celtics won three NBA titles in McHale's 13-year career as part of a frontcourt with Parish and Larry Bird. McHale retired after last season and the Celtics are having their worst season since 1978–79 with a 20–23 record.

Boston led 26–23 after one period and built its biggest lead of the half, 55–45, by scoring the final eight points before intermission.

The Celtics are 14–10 on Super Bowl Sundays and have played the same day as the NFL title game every year since 1974.

Prisoners escape in broad daylight

SHIRLEY, Mass. (AP) — Police throughout the Northeast have been on the lookout for a pair of prisoners who walked away from a minimum security facility Friday.

William Santos, 24, of Holyoke, and Jose Ramos, 33, of Springfield, told MCI–Shirley prison officials they were going on a mid–morning walk. When they failed to return, the search began, Department of Corrections spokesperson Tony Carnevale said Sunday.

Carnevale said that since the two were in a minimum– security prison, they were probably nearing the end of their sentences.

Santos had been convicted of armed assault and Ramos had been imprisoned for dealing cocaine.

Carnevale said he did not immediately know how long the two had been in prison and could not comment on whether there had been previous problems with the inmates.

The Far Side — By Gary Larson

"Well, I'd recommend either the chicken-fried steak or maybe the seafood platter. But look — I gotta be honest with ya — nothin' we serve is exactly what I'd call food for the gods."

Your Horoscope
By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Think about how the commitments you make now will affect your financial future. Keeping your word to someone could be difficult if circumstances change. Set some money aside for a rainy day.

TAURUS (April 20–May 27): Resist the temptation to dig into your savings to make a risky investment. Stick to the safe–and–sure now, even in romance. Do not let a tug-of-war weaken your resolve.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): Avoid making special deals — they could jeopardize your financial security or reputation. Lay the foundation for advancement by taking career-oriented classes. You need to banish a secret fear. Consult a professional.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): Your ability to express your thoughts concisely makes you an important player at work. Someone who asks for advice is willing to pay for it. Keep an open mind if discussing politics.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Clever ideas can strike without warning, but them down before they evaporate. Be prudent in both romance and financial matters. Consult an expert about investments. Tactfully take charge in a family crisis.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Do not forget to fulfill a promise to your partner. A social gaffe may embarrass you for the moment, but it could also open new doors. A VIP offers to help your career.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Higher–ups value your originality and good taste. By showcasing your talents to your best advantage, you will put yourself in line for a promotion or raise. Keep your personal and professional lives separate.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Honesty pays big dividends. Speak out forcefully on an issue important to your family or community. Others will applaud your sincerity and passion even if they do not agree with your conclusions.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): New job leads come through networking. A hunch can save you big money! Communication with your one–and–only improves. Relatives provide valuable inside information.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): Words prove lucky for you now, from novels to memos. Reconcile with a sibling. Short business trips will help you land new clients. Let your partner make the next move in romance.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Getting better organized should be a top priority. Business agreements prove easy to finalize. Romance could be another story. Diplomacy helps you mend some broken fences. A small gift will help, too.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Do not let modesty keep you from getting credit for your ideas. Speak up! Double–check facts and figures to prevent costly mistakes. Friends prove their loyalty when the chips are down.

Donta Bright slams one home on a spectacular base-line jam in yesterday's Massachusetts win over Rhode Island.

URI rammed from the start

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

Passion. Intensity. Aggressiveness.

Those are the qualities that have made Massachusetts a top notch basketball team during Coach John Calipari's reign. After seeing those qualities waver off and on during the past four games, Calipari watched as those qualities returned full- time yesterday at the William D. Mullins Center as the No. 8 Minutemen overwhelmed the Rhode Island Rams, 76–47.

"That was like a blast from the past," Calipari said. "That was the way I've seen this team play in the past."

UMass (16–3, 8–0 Atlantic 10), which was 2–2 in its previous four games, put together its first complete game in quite some time, using a 24–3 run midway through to pull away from the Rams (6–9, 3–5 A–10). The run saw the Minutemen, who fell to Cincinnati in their previous game, expand their 24–17 lead with nearly eight minutes left in the first half to 48–20 with 15:40 to go in the game.

Entering the game, Calipari knew he wanted to see improved play from the outset, so he mixed up his lineup a little bit. Freshman Marcus Camby started in the frontcourt in place of junior Lou Roe while fellow frosh Edgar Padilla stepped in the backcourt for junior Mike Williams, who collapsed in Thursday's game against Cincinnati from apparent dehydration and sat out yesterday while undergoing precautionary tests at a Worcester hospital. Both Camby and Padilla had tremendous influence in the outcome.

Camby (15 points, 10 rebounds, six blocks) did not allow the Rams to get any production inside the paint, while Padilla (nine points, seven assists) harnessed URI's point guard, Carlos Cofield, into 3-for- 15 shooting and seven turnovers.

"Edgar's real quick, he is constantly pressuring the ball, he's real disruptive," Cofield said. "Marcus Camby really took us out of the game in the first half, he had us changing our shots."

"Edgar Padilla was fearless today," Calipari said. "He plays like a junior or a senior, he is not afraid to make plays."

That was apparent from the outset when Padilla made a nifty dish to junior guard Derek Kellogg for a layup on the fast break to open up the game's scoring. Kellogg, who scored eight points in the first 10 minutes, said that Padilla helped him get good shots at his new shooting guard slot.

"I felt comfortable out there at the two (shooting guard), and I have to give credit to Edgar because he set me up with good shots," Kellogg said.

The Minutemen began their huge midgame run on a Donta Bright (11 points, six rebounds, 2 blocks, 2 steals) second- chance layup, but it was Camby who stole the show with nine points during the spree. A Camby free throw sent the Minutemen into the locker room with a comfortable 39–18 lead at the half. Calipari said that Camby's play during that stretch was the best he's seen since coaching at UMass.

In the beginning of the second half, UMass took to the air and did their best Bud Light Daredevils imitation, soaring for three dunks, one by Bright and two by Camby, to push their lead to 25, at 45–20, early in the second half.

After a URI 11–2 run cut the UMass lead to 19 at 50–31, Padilla sandwiched an 18–footer and a trey around a Ram free throw to push the UMass bulge back up to 23 at 55–32.

Lou Roe (11 points, five rebounds), who was limited to just six minutes in the first half with three fouls, then decided to get busy, scoring eight of UMass' next 11 points to give the Minutemen a 66–34 advantage with 4:49 to go.

From then on in it was playground time; Ted Cottrell made a nifty spin move in the post, Jeff Meyer followed a miss with a two–handed hammer jam, and URI's Cordell Llewellyn reverse jammed to get the final margin. "I think we had to prove something today and it was good that we went out and did it," Calipari said.

Game Notes: Before the game the UMass women's soccer team was honored for this past season in which the Minutewomen went to the NCAA Final Four. George "Trigger" Burke, a former UMass hoops player was also honored for his contributions to the University.

Changes help freshmen click

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

Doing his best impersonation of President–elect Bill Clinton, Massachusetts Coach John Calipari called for change heading into yesterday's Atlantic 10 match–up in the William D. Mullins Center with the Rhode Island Rams.

But unlike President Clinton's failed plans so far after his one year in office, Calipari's worked to perfection and the Minutemen used a spark provided by new blood in the starting line–up, en route to a 76–47 romp of the Rams. The victory keeps Massachusetts undefeated in the A–10 at 8–0 (16–3 overall), while URI drops to 3–5 in conference play (6–9 overall).

Two freshmen, Edgar Padilla and Marcus Camby, were on the court for the starting tip, replacing Massachusetts co– captain Lou Roe and junior two–guard Mike Williams. Williams, after collapsing near mid–court during the second half in his team's 76–74 loss at Cincinnati, was not in attendance yesterday. The Hartford, Conn., native was in Worcester at a hospital, undergoing comprehensive tests to find out the cause of the collapse.

Roe, however, was benched by Calipari because he wasn't "starting with the intensity or the fire he needs to.

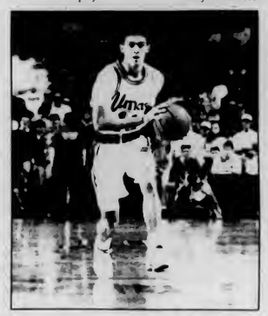
"Whether he starts or not, the point is to take the heat off him and just go play ball," said Calipari.

With Roe on the bench, Camby shined, scoring 15 points, snaring 10 rebounds and swatting six shots. Without Williams, point guard Derek Kellogg switched to shooting guard, allowing Padilla to step in and run the club. Padilla tallied nine points and seven assists, while only turning the ball over three times; Kellogg finally snapped out of his slump, scoring eight points, looking very confident as the two guard.

More importantly was the defense of Rhody's leading scorer Abdul Fox in the first half — Kellogg and freshman Carmelo Travieso smothered the 6–foot–6 senior, forcing him to 2–of–8 shooting for a total of six points. The aforementioned starting trio of Kellogg, Padilla and Camby got Massachusetts going early, combining on the first hoop of the game for the Minutemen. Camby pinned a Ram shot on the glass, corralled the rebound and tossed it up ahead to Padilla.

Padilla drove to the basket and dropped a bounce pass around a Rhode Island defender to Kellogg, who promptly laid it in for the 2–0 lead.

"Edgar did a real good job of getting me open, which gave me the confidence to come down and shoot the ball and I credit him for that," said Kellogg. "He has a lot of talent and it was just a matter of time before he learned the system and how to harness his talent to put it into good use.



"His ability to create in the open court and his defensive abilities will make him a better player in the future. Hopefully not too quick, though."

Camby's start was his first since he was injured in the Pre– season NIT, and he responded. Padilla last started back in December versus Holy Cross and played with poise again.

"[Camby's] long, he blocks shots and commands respect of the boards," said Fox, who finished with a game–high 19 points, a majority of those with his team trailing by double– digits. "He's a tough player; I wish we had him here [at URI]."

Calipari said that he would not make a decision on the starting line–up for Thursday night's game with Florida State (7:30 p.m., Mullins Center) until after he sees the squad practice the days leading up to the contest.

With their performances, both Camby and Padilla made a statement for as well as they can play when given minutes — they also made Calipari's decision of change an easy one to swallow.

Player of the Game

UMass basketball

Marcus Camby

The 6–foot–11–inch freshman took advantage of his first start since the Preseason NIT, recording a double–double (15 points and 10 rebounds) to go along with his six blocks. Camby shot 7–10 from the field, including two monstrous dunks that sent the 9,000–plus to their feet.

Why Massachusetts won the game:

The Minutemen did yesterday what they hadn't done in the three previous games — they played forty minutes of basketball. Coming off a loss to DePaul, a buzzer–shot win against George Washington, and a lass at Cincinnati, the Minutemen played well in spurts during each of these three games. Unfortunately for the Rams, UMass broke out of their slump.

The Minutemen had a definite size advantage over the Rams, evident by the rebound totals (56 to the Rams' 33). Despite Lou Roe having an off–night (11 points), the Minutemen still dominated the inside game, as Marcus Camby and Dana Dingle each pulled down 10 boards. Camby also had six blocks for UMass.

While the offense flourished, the Minutemen played a strong defensive game, forcing the Rams to shoot 28 percent from the floor. Because of the 29–point blowout, every Minuteman saw action.

UMass takes Temple in OT

By SEAN P. HAYDEN

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team upped its Atlantic 10 record to 3–2 with a 57–52 overtime win against the Temple Owls in Philadelphia Saturday afternoon.

The Minutewomen capped off a week that saw them defeat 3–4 Duquesne (64–53) on Monday and fall to 4–2 George Washington (63–49) on Wednesday.

As has been the norm lately, Massachusetts was paced by the effort of sophomore forward Octavia Thomas.

Thomas, who was named Atlantic 10 Player of the Week, grabbed her third double–double of the week against the Owls, scoring a team–high 22 and hauling in 12 rebounds.

The two teams were tied at halftime at 19 and again at the end of regulation at 47 before the Minutewomen pulled away with a 10–point overtime performance.

The key for Massachusetts was the outstanding play of the frontcourt as the trio of Thomas, freshman Crystal Carroll and sophomore Melissa Gurile combined for 39 of the team's points and 26 of its 44 rebounds, while limiting their Temple counterparts to 12 points.

While the Owls may have struggled in the paint, they seemed to have no troubles from the outer limits, scoring 44 of their points on outside buckets.

Junior guard Chantel Adkins led the Temple attack from the perimeter. Adkins accounted for 50 percent of the Owl scoring, tallying 26 on 7–18 shooting, with all seven field goals from three–point land.

Adkins' final trey came with 22 seconds remaining in regulation and tied the score at 47, forcing the extra session.

Massachusetts and Temple don't hook up again until March as both teams close out the season against each other.

The Minutewomen (9–6) stay in Philadelphia tonight when they face the St. Joseph's Hawks at Alumni Memorial Fieldhouse. Massachusetts split with St. Joe's last year, claiming a 65–56 win in the Cage while falling at Alumni 68–57.

Hockey beats first Div. I opponent

Moriarty keys Massachusetts win recording 29 saves

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts hockey team beat its first Division I opponent of the year Saturday night, travelling into West Point, N.Y., and defeating the Cadets of Army 4– 3.

Rich Moriarty made 29 saves, 14 of which came in the scoreless third period as the Minutemen won on the road for only the second time in almost two months.

"This is definitely the biggest win of my career," said Moriarty, who won his fifth game this year. "Everything was stacked against us. The fans were crazy, and the rink was loud, but I knew if I could shut them down in the third period we would win."

Warren Norris scored two of the first three UMass goals, the first at 2:09 of the first period. Defenseman Brett Funck of Army tied the game at 7:32 on an assist from Frank Fede and Tom Deveans. It was the last tie Army would have.

Dennis Wright scored his 11th goal of the year midway through the opening period on assists from Norris and Steve Corradi, and Norris put UMass up 3–1 with a goal at 18:54.

"They played a very physical game because they don't have many talented players on the team," said defenseman Bill Condon. "They rely on fitness but we knew we were just as fit as they were."

UMass' special teams faltered in the second period as Army scored two power play goals. The first came only 41 seconds into the period after Mike Evans was caught hooking. Joe Sharrock cut the lead to 3–2 with the goal, which was assisted by Leif Hansen and Ian Winer.

Tom Sheehan gave UMass a two–goal cushion at 3:02, on his sixth goal, which was the last the Minutemen would score. Hansen made it a one–goal contest by beating Moriarty at 15:18, with the score 4–3 in the Minutemen's favor.

"It was real tense in the third period," said Condon: "The goaltending was outstanding. Rich made some incredible saves in the third period."

"It was who wanted it most in the end would win, and we wanted it more than they did," Moriarty said.

The Cadets had two power play chances in the final period, including one in the last three minutes, but UMass was able to stop them down.

Brian Bolio saved 23 shots for Army (10–13) and was able to hold UMass scoreless on their power play (0–for–6). But against Bolio and all odds, the Minutemen came up on top at the end.

Men's gym wipes out the Navy

By DAVID GLEESON

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team returned to action Friday night at the Curry Hicks Cage against Navy, winning the meet by 10.1 points with a 226.7–point total.

UMass won all the events of the meet with the exception of the high bar, and captured first, second and third in the floor exercise and vault. UMass freshman Gabe Columbus also took first place in the all–around competition with 52.5 points.

During competition over winter break, UMass traveled to the West Point Open and the Windy City Invitational placing eighth and ninth respectively, out of a field of approximately 12 teams.

Though UMass had mixed results over the break, the Minutemen were well prepared for their return to home turf.

"We put in a lot of hours, a lot of time," said Columbus. "We really pushed hard for this meet."

UMass Coach Roy Johnson indicated that his team was confident they could win by about five points having an advantage over Navy in that "we have a very strong ring team."

Another aspect of their game the Minutemen have improved is high bar.

"High bar really pleased me," said Johnson. "Last season's high was 8.5 on the high bar."

This season the scores on the high bar are climbing, which will contribute some big points to their scores that were not there last season. Johnson indicated that "we should have a really good high bar team later this season."

Columbus took first place in the all–around competition with some big numbers and a more consistent performance than he had in the last few meets.

"He's an outstanding competitor and an outstanding gymnast," said Johnson. "As he gets a little more consi-tent with pommel horse and still rings, he could be one of the top all–arounders in the conference as a freshman."

Johnson mentioned senior co–captain Jason Braud as someone else who "really contributes" to the team with some "big numbers." Braud scored a 9.7 on the floor exercise and a 9.35 on the vault.

The Minutemen return to action Feb. 5, when they compete against Vermont at the Curry Hicks Cage.

Mandatory seat belt law effective today

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — Whenever she gets in her new car, Pat Danilecki won't need any more motivation to wear her seat belt than her redheaded daughter, Mary Kate.

Beginning Tuesday, Massachusetts law will require drivers and passengers to buckle up.

Danilecki, of Boston's Dorchester neighborhood, already fastens her safety belt and puts her 15–month–old daughter in safety seat. The importance was made clear to her two days before Christmas.

Driving on Boston's Southeast Expressway, Danilecki's car was struck by a van and another auto and sent careening into another lane.

In the ensuing accident, her car flipped and landed in the opposite lane, upside down.

Mother and daughter emerged shaken, but unscathed.

"Seat belts do work and they do save lives," Danilecki said Monday. "My daughter was in her seat restraint, and I was in my seat belt, and we're both here today."

"To wear your seat belt is just common sense."

The Legislature enacted the mandatory seat belt law over Republican Gov. William Weld's veto Jan. 4. Under the law, drivers and passengers can be fined $25 for not wearing seat belts, but they can be cited only if the vehicle has been stopped for another alleged infraction.

Massachusetts had a mandatory belt law for 11 months in 1986 before voters repealed it. A movement to put the law on the November 1994 ballot already has begun.

During the last 10 years, 45 states have adopted mandatory seat belt laws and the percentage of motorists using them increased from 11 in 1982 to 62 last year. Massachusetts has a seat belt usage rate of 32 percent. If that rate reaches 50 percent, auto insurance rates would be cut at least 5 percent.

A driver's auto insurance rates won't go up if they are ticketed for not wearing a seat belt.

Tom McGovern of the Governor's Highway Safety Bureau said the agency plans to hire a public relations firm to create an education campaign on seatbelts and safe driving, post road signs on the belt law this spring, and air public service announcements later this week.

The chairmen of the Legislature's Public Safety Committee — Rep. Paul E. Caron, D–Springfield, and Sen. James P. Jajunga, D–Methuen — asked authorities to issue only warnings during February, saying it wouldn't be fair to issue citations without first educating the public.

Sgt. Joseph Howley, a spokesman for State Police, said troopers were told they could issue warnings while motorists get used to the law.

The Massachusetts Turnpike Authority has posted signs about the belt law, and mailed out post cards urging people to buckle up.

Caron said the state lost $1.6 million in highway construction money because it missed an October deadline from the federal government to have laws mandating both motorcycle helmets and seat belts. Massachusetts has a helmet law.

SGA fights tuition hike

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

Last Thursday the leadership of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association met with leaders of the state's Higher Education Coordinating Council in an effort to convince them that the cost of attending UMass cannot increase any more.

The HECC sets the rate at which University tuition can increase each year. After the HECC sets the rate, the University Board of Trustees decides the exact percentage tuition will increase. Last year, the HECC voted six to five to set the increase range from 2 to 4 percent, and the Trustees voted to increase tuition by 4 percent. SGA President David Nunez said the meeting was an attempt to convince HECC to make a 0 percent increase an option for the Trustees.

"We discussed putting the number zero in the increase range," Nunez said. "But all we got was the same old song and dance about how with the high cost of education there will be higher [financial] aid, but all we have been getting is high cost and low aid."

Student Center for Education and Research Advocacy Issues Coordinator Mirran Raphaely said HECC defended setting the increase range as high as 4 percent by saying a steady increase in tuition would stabilize the University. But Raphaely refuted the HECC stance. UMass is the second most expensive public University in the United States.

"If every other public college increased their tuition 6 percent each year and UMass increased tuition 3 percent each year it would take 23 years for UMass to reach the middle of the pack," Raphaely said.

HECC Chairman Richard Wiley said HECC is has not really begun the process of deciding what the tuition increase will be for next year, but he said the council will have an open mind.

"What will happen this year has yet to be determined," Wiley said. "But we have no preconceptions."

Wiley said HECC is well aware that UMass is the House on hill home to Scotts

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

When Chancellor David K. Scott began his job at the University of Massachusetts, an agreement was made that he and his wife Kathleen Scott would be able to live in the chancellor's house by Orchard Hill.

Before the Scotts moved into the house, the last people to occupy it were Chancellor Joseph H. Duffey and his family in 1990. Currently, only Kathleen and David live there. Two of their children live in Boston and their third child lives in Las Vegas.

They moved into the house in July 1993. Kathleen Scott said when they first arrived they removed a great deal of the furniture there.

"A lot of it was either modern or run–down. We kept some of it and moved some of the furniture in other rooms other than they were originally in," she said.

The house has three floors. On the first level, there is a living room with many pieces of furniture from the 17th, 18th, 19th and 20th centuries. There are also many long windows.

Also, throughout the living and dining room, as well as the entire house, there are many Oriental rugs. The furniture in the house is mainly wood and the walls are dominantly white.

"When we moved in we wanted to have our own furniture. I like to describe the overall appearance of the house as eclectic," Scott said.

The basic use of the first floor is for entertainment. The living room is big enough to sit at least 40 people. There is a kitchen with appliances kept from the 1950s, a smaller room where there is additional storage and a work area for the caterers.

"The kitchen is not in great condition because it has gotten so much use. There have been

Leaky roof forces residents to move

By BEN GEMAN
Collegian Staff

Adding to the woes inflicted on the University of Massachusetts campus by bitter coldness and treacherous foot travel, this winter's unusually high amount of precipitation has caused water leakages in the John Adams and Washington Residence Towers in Southwest.

Snow and ice accumulation coupled with rainfall has caused water to travel through areas of roofing.

Students from at least one room on the 22nd floor of John Adams have been relocated due to water leaking into their room from the roof of the building.

"The water seems to be finding its way into the masonry. We're seeing leaks where we've never seen them before," said Marcia Armstrong, Southwest operations manager.

Most of the water leaking into the 22nd floor of John Adams is coming through in the hallway areas and to date there have been no reports of damage to student property.

The leaking water has damaged closet space in the vacated room in John Adams. Armstrong said the dripping water may also damage floors and force repainting in affected areas.

In an effort to end the leaking, maintenance crews have been shovelling snow and ice from the roofs of the affected buildings, and some areas of roofing vulnerable to water seepage have been patched. More extensive repairs to the roof of John Adams have been planned for this spring.

Housing services has also requested that a new roof be put on the building this summer and a decision on the request is due later this week, according to John Findley, assistant director of Housing Services for Maintenance Operations.

Other residence halls may also begin to have leakage problems as a result of this winter's heavy snow and ice accumulation and rainfall.

"Water finds its way into openings. We're anticipating that there will be leaks in other student rooms that will be attributable to weather," said Findley.

Cold winter weather has also been blamed for malfunctions with temperature controls in several residence halls. Heating systems in Coolidge, Thorough, Wheeler and Mary Lyon Residence Halls have all been affected by prolonged stretches of cold weather.

Fed plans rate hike to curb inflation fears

By DAVE SKIDMORE
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan said Monday it's a matter of when the central bank raises short–term interest rates, and he warned that waiting until inflation worsens would only mean harsher increases later.

"Short–term interest rates are currently abnormally low," he told Congress' Join Economic Committee. "At some point, absent an unexpected and prolonged weakening of economic activity, we will need to move them."

He carefully avoided saying exactly when, but private economists widely expect an increase in the overnight rate for loans among bank anytime between next month and the end of spring.

It would be the first increase in this federal–funds rate in five years, when the rate peaked at 9.75 percent, and the first change of any kind since September 1992 when the rate fell to a nearly 30–year low of 3 percent.

A rise in the rate engineered by the Fed eventually could translate into increases in consumer rates on auto loans, adjustable–rate mortgages and bank deposits.

Long–term rates are set in financial markets and would not necessarily be affected by a Fed move.

At the White House, President Clinton said "there's no evidence that inflation is coming back," but he sounded almost resigned to a modest increase in short–term rates.

"What I hope is that it won't raise long–term rates because there is no need to do it. And I hope that the stock market won't take an adverse view because we've still got good strong growth in this economy," he said.

The Democratic chairman and vice–chairman of the joint committee — Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin and Sen. Paul Sarbanes of Maryland — urged Greenspan to postpone any rate increase as long as possible.

"I think the economic ship is on course. I think steady as she goes is the lesson all of us should draw from the current situation," Sarbanes said.

Greenspan acknowledged that many of the forces that restrained inflation to 2.7 percent in 1993, the second best showing in 29 years, will work to hold down prices this year.

He noted "upward pressure on prices of a number of industrial materials" and warned it would be a mistake to delay raising rates until after inflation clearly had gotten worse.

FAC robbed; equipment lost

By BEN GEMAN
Collegian Staff

The Fine Arts Center has been the target of two thefts in the last month and a half, with equipment being stolen from the Theatre and Music Departments.

On January 11, the Theater Department reported the theft of an Apple laser printer and Apple computer mouse from the costume department. The equipment, valued at over $700 was stolen from a locked office with no sign of forced entry, according to University Police Court Liason Officer Philip J. Cavanaugh. Other pieces of computer equipment located in the same office were not tampered with.

In early December an amplifier valued at approximately $1,000 was stolen from the Music Department.

While both departments are located in the Fine Arts Center, Cavanaugh would not speculate as to a possible relationship between the thefts.

"We have nothing to tie–in that says there's a connection," said Cavanaugh.

Officers from the University Police Crime Prevention Unit have been advising different departments on campus as to methods of preventing future thefts. Measures such as the installation of new locks and the engraving of computer equipment have been recommended. Cavanaugh said preventative security measures are being most highly concentrated on buildings with large amounts of computer equip-

Relief missions to aid Bosnians

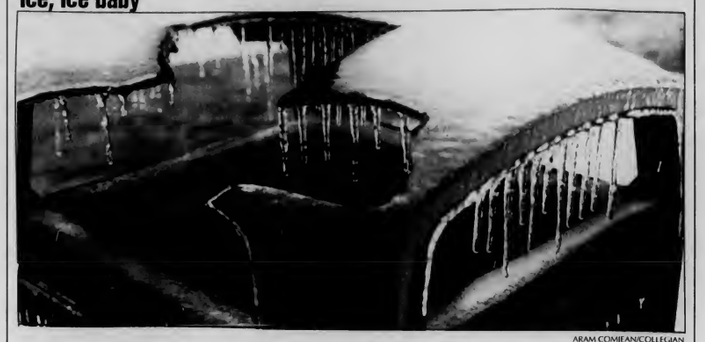
By BARRY SCHWEID
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Clinton administration endorsed a report Monday by the U.N. secretary–general that gives the go–ahead for air strikes against Bosnian Serbs if they attack peacekeepers in two key towns.

The administration continued to pursue an allied consensus as President Clinton met at the White House with German Chancellor Helmut Kohl. it could be part of a final concerted diplomatic effort to settle the bloody conflict in the former Yugoslav republic before military action by the NATO allies.

Disagreeing with France's inclination to pressure the Muslim–led Bosnian government into accepting settlement terms, the administration is sounding out Kohl, British Foreign Minister Douglas Hurd and Greek Foreign Minister Karolos Papoulias this week in hopes of forging a joint approach.

Greece currently holds the presidency of the European nation.



In a letter Friday to the U.N. Security Council, Secretary–General Boutros Boutros–Ghali said he had instructed top U.N. officials to move "actively" with plans to open the Tuzla airport for relief supplies and to relieve Canadian units at Srebrenica with Dutch peacekeepers.

"We've endorsed that report," Secretary of State Warren Christopher said Monday. "That could lead to the use of air power if there's not an agreement."

The Clinton administration has not shied away from threatening the Serbs. It also has not made good on Clinton's campaign pledge in 1992 to lift a ban on arms to Bosnian government forces or to silence Serb artillery.

Christopher said last week the administration was "quite prepared" to carry out NATO and U.N. military threats. He insisted the United States was not just "standing by."

Fighting rages in Somalia

Marines cite 'self–defense' as reason for shooting

By THOMAS WAGNER
Associated Press

MOGADISHU, Somalia — In the worst shooting involving American troops in three months, U.S. Marines opened fire in a street crowded with Somalis waiting for free food Monday. At least five people died and many were wounded.

A U.S. spokesman said the 22 Marines shot in self–defense after their five–vehicle convoy was fired on by at least two Somali snipers.

Somali witnesses said no one shot at the Americans. They said they felt the Marines fired because they thought hundreds of Somalis standing in a street outside a food distribution center were trying to stop the convoy.

The commander of the Bangladeshi soldiers guarding a nearby traffic circle said his men did not see any snipers when the Marines opened fire with machine guns, but he could not rule out that shots were fired at the Americans. Journalists at a nearby hotel heard one or two gunshots a moment before heavy weapons fire.

Dozens of Somalis ran through the area shouting anti– American slogans, and carrying the dead and wounded away on wheelbarrows. A dozen Saudi Arabian soldiers were handing out food at the center when the shooting occurred, but none was injured.

About 5,000 American servicemen are in Somalia as part of the U.N. peacekeeping force. The Americans are in the process of withdrawing to meet a March 21 deadline set by President Clinton after 18 U.S. Army soldiers died in a battle with Somali gunmen Oct. 3.

U.S. officials said the shooting involved three Humvees and two cars carrying two unidentified American diplomats to a meeting to discuss clan violence with representatives of warlord Mohamed Farrah Aidid's coalition. The meeting was canceled after the shooting.

IRA leader scheduled to attend peace negotiations in New York

By RICHARD PYLE
Associated Press

NEW YORK — After years of being banned from the United States, the leader of the Irish Republican Army's political wing arrived in New York on Monday to attend a conference on peace in Northern Ireland.

Organizers called the visit a "historic breakthrough."

Security was tight as Gerry Adams, president of Sinn Fein, arrived at John F. Kennedy International Airport at 4:45 p.m. He was given a two–day visa for Tuesday's conference, which will focus on the Joint Declaration signed in December by the British and Irish governments.

"I think we are at a very critical part of the entire peace process," Adams said shortly after he arrived. "The IRA can make a positive contribution to that peace process. Our job has to be to move the process forward and make sure the opportunity is not squandered."

A visa for Adams was blocked at least eight times over the last two decades because of British objections and U.S. policy requiring a special waiver for leaders of organizations known or suspected of supporting terrorism.

This time he won out after lengthy deliberations involving President Clinton and Secretary of State Warren Christopher.

Boarding an Aer Lingus flight in Dublin, the 44–year–old Adams said his views were "quite simply and straightforward — I want an end to violence."

The IRA seeks an end to British rule over Northern Ireland and that province's unification with the Republic of Ireland. In the December declaration, Britain said it had no strategic or economic interest in Northern Ireland and agreed to unification if a majority of the people there favored it.

Adams was invited to join in the December pact, but has thus far declines, saying he wanted certain "clarifications" from the British side.

Of four other political leaders invited from Northern Ireland for Tuesday's conference, two agreed to attend and the two, including the Rev. Ian Paisley, the extremist Protestant leader, refused.

second most expensive school in the country and the HECC will consider that a factor in determining the increase rate. He said they will also take into account what it considers to be a fair amount of the cost for students and their families to pay.

Wiley said must also consider the possibility that, assuming inflation continues to increase 3 percent each year and there is no tuition increase and no increase in funding from the state legislature, there will have to be a 3 percent cut in program spending at the University. He said HECC will consider the tuition increase in its March meeting and will make a final decision by April 15.

"We are going to be working for a sensible and fair conclusion," Wiley said.

Local shelters need help

By JOY COLLINS
Collegian Staff

"People often get jobs by knowing people and by being in the right place at the right time," said a former educator/advocate, who is currently employed by the Everywoman's Center.

Meeghan Ziolkowski, a graduate student in the social justice education department at the University of Massachusetts, said her volunteer work at the EWC lead to a paid position.

"As a volunteer you become very valuable to an organization. You are familiar with the way things run and have already shown that you care, not because it's your job, but because it's important to you," Ziolkowski said.

Eileen Lewis, a community educator at Womanshelter Companeras in Holyoke, said she used volunteering as a way to explore different interests before deciding on a career.

"As a volunteer the fact that you are not getting paid doesn't even enter your mind. The things you get back from volunteering you can't measure," Lewis said.

Irma Gonzalez, the Educator/Advocate Program Coordinator at the EWC, said her volunteer experience benefited her greatly.

"It makes a big difference. It was practical work that lead me directly to a job," Gonzalez said.

Besides making good contacts and getting experience, volunteer work often includes training that teaches skills that are invaluable in an increasingly competitive job market.

According to Carol Wallace, director of the EWC, the EWC can serve as a training site that provides women with the opportunity "to learn marketable skills in a supportive environment."

For example, the 60–hour training required for the counselor/ advocate or educator/ advocate program also gives participants state certification as rape crisis counselors or educators. It is also possible to get academic credit for participation in this program.

There are many volunteer opportunities in the area for people who are concerned about issues such as violence against women, rape, domestic violence, legal representation for battered women and violence in teen relationships. Many organizations also need volunteers to help with budgeting, administrative tasks and fundraising.

The Everywoman's Center is accepting applications for the counselor/advocate and educator/advocate programs. The programs provide support services for survivors of sexual assault and raise public awareness through education. The deadline for these applications is Wednesday, Feb. 2. For applications or information, call 545–3474.

Womanshelter Companeras in Holyoke needs volunteers to help families begin to live lives free of violence. If interested In answering the hotline, working with children, advocacy, fundraising or administrative work, please contact Edith Jennings–Wigfall, Monday–Friday between 8:00 a.m. and 4:00 p.m. at 538–9717. Training sessions begin Feb. 11.

Necessities/Necesidades, Inc. in Northhampton is beginning a new court–based Legal Advocacy Program. Court–advocates help provide information and assistance to women seeking restraining orders. Advocates will receive training that will help them to clearly explain the law and options under the law. If interested please call Sandy Goodman at 586–1125. The next training begins Feb. 22, applications are due Feb. 14.

so many dinner parties and so many guests in this area. The stove and refrigerator are not in good condition at all. I had to buy a new dish–washing machine," she said.

There is also a sitting room, which is a screened–in porch on the first floor. The area is all windows and full of plants.

On the second floor there are two guest bedrooms which are furnished with antiques originally from the Scotts' other house. She collected and saved many pieces from her childhood home.

Also located on the second floor are the master bedroom, a family room and a third guest bedroom which was made into Scott's study.

"Since I work out of the house, I needed a place to keep all of my books, so we changed one of the guests rooms into my study," Scott said.

House manager Peg Willson also has her office on the second floor. Willson is the special events coordinator of the home. She is in charge of handling the dinner receptions and dealing with the invitations and caterers. Before the Scotts moved in she was also in charge of the housekeeping. Yet recently, Pat Dunshee has been hired.

On the top floor of the house, there are three bedrooms for the chidren. Scott said they don't live in the home, but when they are there "the kids" have a place to stay.

Scott said she loves the location of the house, on a much– traveled pathway to the dormitories. So far she has not had a problem with the students causing loud noises.

Gunman's sanity still questioned

Experts at Lo trial debate mental state during attack

SPRINGFIELD — Experts for the prosecution testified Monday that campus killer Wayne Lo, however disturbed, knew he was wrong to rake his college campus with gunfire.

Lo, 19, of Billings, mont., who was a sophomore at Simon's Rock College of Bard, is accused of opening fire at its Great Barrington campus on Dec. 14, 1992. A professor and student were killed, and four people were wounded.

His lawyers have made an insanity defense at this month– long trial in Hampden Superior Court in Springfield. Their experts said Lo suffers from schizophrenia, a mental illness that distorts a person's contact with reality.

But a prosecution witness, Wesley Profit, a psychologist at Bridgewater State Hospital, said Monday that Lo is not mentally Ill. He said Lo does suffer from a less serious "narcissistic personality disorder" that gives him an overinflated image of his own importance.

"The striking thing about Mr. Lo was his need to control the examination process," said Profit, who interviewed Lo for 20 hours after the violence.

Prosecution witnesses have indicated Lo cast his violence in quasi–religious terms, using biblical references, to trick people into thinking he is crazy.

Those who know Lo have also described him as a troubled teen–ager who sometimes voiced hate for blacks, Jews, homosexuals, AIDS sufferers, and the handicapped.

Such comments sometimes raised eyebrows at the liberal– minded campus, an alternative school of about 300 students, including many of high–school age. But Lo had no history of mental treatment before his attack.

To acquit Lo on the basis of insanity, the jury must decide that he did not know right from wrong or could not act on that understanding because of mental illness.

Dr. Michael Annunziata, a psychiatrist called by the prosecution, told jurors Monday that Lo understood the wrongfulness of his actions. He cited the facts that Lo concealed his pruchase of ammunition from college authorities and called police after the violence to negotiate his surrender.

Lo is accused of murder, attempted murder and other charges for his 20–minute sweep of the campus with a semi– automatic rifle. Lo has been held without bail since the killings.

A series of computer thefts took place on the UMASS campus in 1993, with losses totalling more than $30,000.

An Aug. 28 theft from a second floor office in Goessmann lab resulted in a chemistry professor's loss of over $7,000 in Apple computer equipment, including a hard drive with years of research stored on it. During the incident entry to the office was forced by the smashing of a heavy glass window in the door.

Questions without answers

I guess I'm just a curious guy.

Questions roil around my mind every time I am speaking to someone. Questions are a valuable key to knowledge, a tool to help solve many curiosities. Questions are used in a formula to reach a solution.

Wow. Where did all of that come from? Anyway, I ask many questions for many reasons in many different situations. While there are times that my curiosity interests the one I am asking, there are others who get utterly annoyed. To those who wish to answer my questions, I am appreciative. To those who wish not to, what the hell is your problem?

There are many questions I have in my head at the moment. While some can be answered definitively, others will be opinionated. There are also those questions which are impossible to answer. Here is a sampling of some of my interrogative statements:

Why did the people who checked housing during the break call our couch an "unsafe furnishing"? — Since when have couches been considered unsafe furnishings? I wonder if I'm the only one who is just not scared to keep a couch in my room.

How did the "hot hero" sandwich get it's name? — Oh. A ham and cheese sandwich in garlic bread. Hot Hero. Now I get it.

Why does a snooze button go off every nine minutes?

Why doesn't Lionel Richie get the credit he deserves here at UMass? — To all you past, present or prospective fans of the Motown legend, he is supposedly releasing a new album (early '94). I wonder if Strawberries will open up at midnight like they did for Pearl Jam to accommodate the hundreds of fans waiting to purchase the album. Don't laugh.

How do people get the nickname Dick out of the name Richard? — I don't think I really want to know.

Where have you gone, Mr. T? — Oh yeah, you're guest starring on Blossom this week. I should've known.

Why, on Christmas Day of 1992, did my mother, while talking to one of the heavier men we know, accidently say "have a good dinner" instead of "Merry Christmas" or "Happy Holidays"? — I may know, but I don't know if I should admit that I know. You know? What I do know is my mother will never hear the end of it.

How truly painful was it for John Bobbitt when his penis was cut off? — One of the few questions that I would prefer not to have the answer to.

Where did the expression "chewing the fat" come from? — Believe it or not, I heard this ridiculous expression twice in the last two months. And please, don't try to answer this question.

Who is the woman that does the add/drop class registration on the phone? After spending some quality time on the phone trying to get our classes squared away, my friend Michael and I are wondering just who this person is. I am curious to know if she remembers talking to me when I signed up for my classes. Probably not.

Are the Buffalo Bills going to the Super Bowl again next year, and will country music be part of next year's Super Bowl halftime show? — I hope not. This year was enough suffering.

How the hell did I fall out of a car? — it was fourth grade. One minute, I was sitting upright in the car with my back against the door. The next minute, I am in the middle of the road, and my friend's mom is driving away. I sprained my ankle and got two black eyes. I was crying, but not from the pain. Why? Because I ripped my pants. My corduroys. The maroon ones.

How do you like the new size of the Collegian? — Though some will say that it is tough to read in the D.C., it is much improved now, more professional. Everyone will get used to it.

I hope.

Andrew Bryce is a Collegian columnist.

There are many kinds of love

What is love?

This is such a hard question to answer. Love comes in so many different shapes and forms, it is difficult to find just one way to define it. We need it to live. it is one of the forces that drives us to become who we are. Yet there are such enormous problems that are caused by it.

Unfortunately, love and hate seem to go hand in hand sometimes. Even more unfortunately, for some reason, much of this hate towards love seems to be directed at homosexuals and lesbians.

There are so many different kinds of love. A mother kissing her child's boo-boo to make it all better. An elderly couple taking a walk in a park, hand–in–hand. Young people in love. I do not understand why so many people feel threatened by forms of love different than their own. Perhaps they do not understand and, instead of trying to find out and understand others' differences, they lash out in anger at something different from their own understanding of the world, and their own concept of love.

Homosexuality and lesbianism are just different forms of something that most people already know of and understand. Then why do some people feel threatened by this? Do they feel this is going to hurt them personally? Is it going to alter their life in any way? It is doubtful that one is going to be attacked by a gang homosexuals and forced to become a homosexual against their will.

Yet some people seem to be on their own personal crusade to rid the world of these "fiendish" people. Some heterosexuals actually do go out in gangs and beat up homosexuals. I have one question: Why? Do they think about it before they do it? What reasons are used to rationalize this kind of behavior? That some people do not have a certain lifestyle that others do?

Why can't people lead their lives the way they see fit? It is not up to others to determine the way other people should live. Live and let live.

There have been many reasons stated for the rejection of homosexuality. One of these is religious. The Bible calls homosexuality a sin. But does the Bible not also say that we are supposed to treat others as we wish to be treated ourselves?

There is also the reasoning that being a homosexual is "dangerous." it causes the spread of AIDS, it corrupts people everywhere. This is just plain stupid. AIDS is spread by everyone. It is a universal disease. Homosexuals did not cause AIDS. A group of gay people did not sit around one day and decide to create a new disease.

If I ever one day choose to do something, anything, that does not happen to be in agreement with the general population, I hope that I will have the freedom to make my own decisions, and to decide what is right for me without threats of violence or some politician legislating what I can and cannot do with my life.

Sarah Coffey

Hating a group of people for something they did not even cause is, to say the least, rather irrational, and really stupid.

Perhaps I am just being an optimist and hoping for things that our society is not ready for at this point in time. Perhaps I have been watching too much "Star Trek," and the prime directive has gone to my head. But I sincerely believe that we all have the right to live out our lives as we choose, without threats and violence from others for our choices.

I do not happen to be a lesbian or a bisexual. I have decided to be a heterosexual woman, and that is my "lifestyle choice." If I ever one day choose to do something, anything, that does not happen to be in agreement with the general population, I hope that I will have the freedom to make my own decisions, and to decide what is right for me without threats of violence or some politician legislating what I can and cannot do with my life.

There are so many more problems in the world, such as violent crime, wars, hunger and homelessness, just to name a few. Perhaps we should be putting our time and energy into creating a better world for all of us through peace. It would be a lot more productive, and much better for all of us.

Hate is such a wasted emotion. Let love rule.

Sarah Coffey is a freshman majoring in English and journalism.

The trouble with snowplows

The typical New England winter is here — in a major way. Many of the out–of–staters are probably trying to remember why they came to UMass and trying to decide if it was worth it. Consider the many bloopers and blunders that winter brings to UMass in particular before coming to any hasty conclusions.

Let's talk plows. The people who operate these machines are excellent drivers. In my entire stay at UMass I have never witnessed a plow accident. Unfortunately, the good driving gets overlooked because of the many problems which still exist on campus.

The obvious reason is the poor plowing job — which is not entirely related to the plowing itself. It seems that the sub–arctic temperatures had caused much of the snow and ice to freeze to an unplowable level. Still, I cannot help but ask: Why was the plowing not done immediately after the initial snowfall? Would this not have prevented many problems? Regardless, the attempt was made.

On at least seven occasions during the course of the day, I noticed these plow–mobiles driving around campus with plows poised in the upright position. I don't know about you, but last I checked, plows only work when they are being pushed along the ground. See the problem?

Diana D'Avanzo

Another reason for the treacherous campus conditions could be the manner in which the plowing has been carried out. If some plowing had been done during the more "mushy" phases, when the sun had done its job, wouldn't many slips and spills have been avoided? Why did the University insist on waiting until the next morning to plow when everything was frozen over from the night before?

Perhaps slightly more comical, however, are the positions of the plows — not in relation to the streets and walkways, but in relation to the vehicles themselves. On at least seven occasions during the course of the day, I noticed these plow– mobiles driving around campus with plows poised in the upright position. I don't know about you, but last I checked, plows only work when they are being pushed along the ground. See the problem?

Wait, it gets better! I observed another interesting little tidbit of information. As I stated, the University seems to love plowing when everything is frozen over. Fortunately, it does carry out some heavy–duty sanding.

Again, I was curious. It seemed the sand did not intimidate the ice in the least. Why? Again, I was told the blustery weather was to blame. Funny, it worked on my front steps back home. I just could not buy this. Sure enough, a little investigation proved my "the University must be messing up" theory.

I noticed that sand is constantly being scattered across the campus in a desperate attempt to melt the ice. Unfortunately, our friend Mr. Plow, always waiting for the cold to do his job, usually succeeds in scraping most of the sand off of the snow and ice or pushing it off to the side or into the gutter. Just take a look around campus. Very unusual.

Still, our faithful plowers work hard and endure the cold in an attempt to help out the students and make a living. Since they probably do not pack their houses, the University must be blamed for the problems. Am I being too harsh? Think back to this past Friday.

The good news was the University closed at eleven o'clock. The bad news was this did not help those of us who have classes at eight, nine or ten o'clock. After having nearly broken several body parts trying to get across campus, I came to the conclusion that the University should never have been opened at all.

But wait, it gets better. While waiting to catch the Orchard Hill bus to my room, I was excited at the thought of getting warm. The thought soon became a passing fantasy as tremendous overloads forced a long wait. Deciding to walk back up the hill, I could not help but laugh hours later when I discovered that the ice that had caused so many problems had converted the campus into a massive swimming pool.

That bit of humor seemed to make it all worthwhile. Have a great semester!

Letters to the Editor

Don't sing the UMass blues

Every semester it seems that everyone complains about UMass. The Bursar's Office (or Whitmore in general), the D.C.s, the prices in the campus store, all the walking, the busses... it goes on and on.

I happen to love it here. UMass rescued me from the winter–hell of intersession where my best friend was a shovel and I actually said, "Ooooh! Supermarket Sweep is on!" Sad but true.

So, instead of a list of pain–in–the–butt things about UMass, here is my list of things that I love about UMass, and what makes me happy to be here. Maybe you'll agree with me.

1. A library with more than 20 books, and an easy computer system to boot.
2. The movie channel.
3. That funky air tunnel in the Whitmore ramp entrance.
4. The Pub on Saturday nights.
5. Watching people trying to get down the snowy hill behind Grayson–Field.
6. The D.C.'s all–you–can–eat plan. Starving, bad cooks like me can't complain.
7. Mission IMPROVable and S.V.P.
8. The D.P. Dough meal plan (can I buy stocks in that?).
9. The campus pond ducks.
10. The campus pond swan — from a distance.
11. Studying (a.k.a. sleeping) in the Cape Cod Lounge — especially when someone talented plays at the piano.
12. The wonderful smell of chlorine in Boyden and Totman.
13. The great diversity on campus — even the elevators are diverse, from the turbo–lifts in the Tower Library to Cecil, the elevator in the Mullins rink.
14. All the funky things the telephones can do (remember the 1–900 "scandal" of '92?).
15. Lou Roe ('nuff said).
16. All those tables on the Campus Center Concourse that makes walking to class so much more interesting.
17. Getting messages on voice mail (Oooh! The light is blinking!).
18. Using "The Hill" to run to Boyden in 4.7 minutes.
19. Having the Mullins Center as a landmark already.
20. You.

Shadowlands is a painfully honest love story

By ED HUMPHRIES
Collegian Staff

Love and death. Unseen destinies and wary choices. Decisions between caring hearts and knowing minds. It's the gray areas in between; it's these Shadowlands, that director Richard Attenborough exploits to good measure in his take on the true life romance between Brit author C.S. Lewis and Yankee poet Helen "Joy" Gresham. Meshed within the fog–shrouded Oxford locales, Attenborough delivers the most painfully honest love story of the year.

Attenborough and screenwriter William Nicholson, working from Nicholson's stageplay of the same name, seize the material with a deft touch. Nicholson's poetic lyrics and Attenborough's rich visuals, aided by the lush greens and wispy mists of England get the story running.

However, it's the witty banter and clever rapport between stars Anthony Hopkins and Debra Winger that fuels this ultimately tragic marriage of fifties sensibilities and blind devotion.

Hopkins' C.S. Lewis, known as Jack by his friends, is untouchable. Haunted by the death of his mother at a very young age, he has shirked love, seeking only comfort and magic through the stories the pens of enchanted worlds beyond dusty wardrobes.

It's Winger's Gresham that sees beyond Lewis' guarded facade. She seeks true love, not friendship through Lewis' unconscious mental intimidation, and she seeks to let him know it. Fleeing a fractured marriage, stateside with her son Douglas (the very good Joseph Mazello), she bonds a friendship and ultimately a true love with Lewis, where their happiness accompanies the pain later.

Credit Attenborough and Nicholson for guiding their characters through these shadowlands with a good dose of ironic humor. New York bred Gresham takes aim at English societal customs with great ease, taunting Lewis' collegiate colleagues with biting stabs at their questionable intellect.

It's this honest human humor, resultant from Lewis' romantic awakenings that fill the viewer with good cheer before braving the turbulent emotional waters that lay ahead.

Hopkins and Winger are both at the pinnacles of their form. With a shy demeanor, holding a careful spirit, Hopkins seems right at ease as the Oxford intellect precariously hiding his true loving feelings for Gresham amid the harsh atmosphere of his watchful colleagues, and more importantly, guarded society.

Winger's tough American bravado hides years of pain, which she sifts throughout nurturing scenes with Douglas and the quiet courtship with Lewis. Her character is a brilliant brushstroke, tough yet guarded, able to face tragedy through knowledge of her mutual love and admiration for Lewis.

Hopkins and Winger are exceptional, their natural screen presence together elates the viewers interest, their tears grab your heartstrings. They are so good together, Its easy to forget they are acting.

Shadowlands is so good, it draws you into its intimacies so successfully, its easy to forget this is just a film. A–. (Hampshire Six).

Calling all viewers: Hug your television

By CALEB COCHRAN
Collegian Staff

I heard someone say in a movie once, "I don't have a TV, i have a life." Well, for those of you who have a TV and a life, welcome to On The Tube, a new weekly column devoted to the magical world of television and the people who watch it.

Originally, I wanted to call this column Notes From the Idiot Box, but it doesn't sound as catchy as On The Tube. With that off my chest, let's dive in.

Contrary to what a lot of crabby old people are saying these days, there is quality programming out there. From top–rate comedies like "Seinfeld" and "The Simpsons" to powerful dramas such as "Homicide" and "NYPD Blue." From specialty networks ranging in topic from sports to music to science to cooking to (gulp) home shopping. From Letterman to Leno, from TNT to TNN to ESPN, television truly has something for everyone.

On the other hand, I'll be the first to admit that there is a lot of crap on TV. It's easy to get bogged down in endless channel–surfing, trying desperately to find something to watch. I had just this kind of experience last Friday evening.

Part of the problem was that I was watching UMass cable, which is television's equivalent of the Commodore Vic 20. God forbid the students actually have a choice of what to watch, other than the three networks and the "movie channel," which basically consists of some kid in his basement with a VCR and about eight video cassettes which he rotates from week to week.

Last semester I was on exchange at another university at which students paid around $25 a semester for a cable system which included everything a student could hope for: ESPN, MTV, TNT, CNN, CBS, NBC, ABC, Fox and all the "Sanford and Son" reruns a viewer could ever want. No, we didn't have SCOLA or WOCH, but I somehow made it through the semester anyway.

On the Tube
By Caleb Cochran

There is no good reason why UMass cannot have a decent cable system. As a campus resident, I know I would pay $25 a semester just for the opportunity to watch "Sportscenter" or "Beavis and Butthead" instead of "George Michael's Sports Machine" and "Married With Children" reruns.

I'll be moving off campus next semester, so I'm not going to lead a crusade for better campus cable. If you plan to be back on campus and agree that our cable system rots, let people know. Round up some friends and protest on the student union steps. Because for Pete's sake, if there were ever a cause worth protesting about, it's your cable television rights.

One secret, eerie history book tells haunting tale

By BRIAN BABINEAU
Collegian Staff

The Secret History
Donna Tartt
Ivy Books

"...I suppose at one time in my life I might have had any number of stories, but now there is no other. This is the only one I will ever be able to tell."

And so Donna Tartt begins to tell us this story, one of the most engrossing and haunting works I have ever read, bar none. Tartt opens by revealing a crime and the guilty party, and then captures us by slowly unfolding the how and why in eerie and sinister degrees.

The tale is told through the eyes of college senior Richard Papen, who transfers to Hampden College in Vermont, a place that bears no superficial resemblance to Bennington College, of which Tartt is an alumni.

Papen joins the Classics major at Hampden, a course of study with only one professor and five other students. It is these five students that capture Richard's attention and slowly draw him into their circle, exposing pieces of themselves as well as a terrible secret that they all share.

Tartt's prosaic style is what makes this novel so deeply involving. Her characterizations mellifluously wrap the students in qualities both real and magical, and immediately attractive. Tartt makes you want to know them and their stories, and as the stories expand, so do their mythical and mysterious qualities.

The book is continually lathered in lush imagery and insightful details involving everything from personal emotions to seasonal changes, as Tartt gives Hampden a haunting and magical quality as well. Every season from fall to spring, shimmers in depth and importance.

It is this combination of Tartt's writing style and the intricate plotlines that make this novel so enveloping. She tells a tale that encompasses friendship and arrogance, evil and fear, lust and recklessness in a setting very familiar to us — college students.

Tartt manages to blend the alcoholic blur and privileged abandon of Brett Easton Ellis' novels, the adolescent angst of Catcher in the Rye and the haunting and evil qualities that exist in and scare every one of us to make one of the most seamless and impressive novels of our generation.

Video games are fun, not violent

NATHAN MARTIN/COLLEGIAN
Even the UMass Campus Center sports its own video game haven.

By TROY L. MERRICK
Collegian Staff

The cacophony of sound, flashing lights, mechanical voices, squealing tires and clinking quarters, coupled with the occasional cheering of the victory or groaning and/or swearing after a loss, are all familiar associations of the video arcade.

Just about all of us can remember standing behind a bunch of bigger kids, patiently waiting our turn to blow up buildings, shoot the villains, slay the mutated monsters and tally as many points as possible to get the "thing" at the time.

Pinball machines still dominate the walls of some arcades here and there, but the wide variety of video games are the major moneysuckers nowadays, offering anyone who ventures past the chance to conquer the far reaches of outer space, save the fair young maiden from the fire-breathing dragon, or be the first across the finish line after a long, winding race at mind-numbing velocities.

The typical fare today, however, has youngsters, college kids (and yes, even the occasional adult) hacking and chopping their way to supremacy in gory one-on-one confrontations, blood spouting out of severed limbs and frisbee-sized holes made by a weapon enthusiast's haven of sharp objects.

Violent games like Mortal Kombat II (to supplement the incredible success of the original) are at the head of this genre of slash-and-tear excitement.

A fairly recent (Dec. 10) article in the Boston Globe titled "Violence in video games prompts Senate grilling" goes into a bevy of reasons why games such as these need to be curtailed before they further damage the minds of all those that come their way. The article proposes that one too many rounds of "Street Fighter" was what convinced Lorena "Ginsu" Bobbit to "dejohnsonize" her hubby.

This malarkey reminds me of the insanity that rose when a couple of guys with nothing better to do decided to off themselves just because they "got the message" from a record. You'd have to be a tad bit unraveled to think that one listen to a song, even backwards, would be all someone needs to throw him or her off the deep end.

Neither is a few quarters' worth of any of these games, no matter how many spines get ripped out, heads get punched off or blood is splattered about. Does anyone really take it seriously? How many people, after playing a game, turn to their friend and say "Let's dress up in skeleton suits and head down to the old folks' home and hack somebody's head off! I can't think of anything I want to do more!"

Are the drive-by shootists, rapists, car bombers and other assorted life-enders compelled to do these by Sega Enterprises? Hard to believe. There isn't any devil-in-one- ear-angel-in-the-other when someone stops by the arcade to pass some leisure time. Video games, although not the most constructive form of activity, do just what they were meant to do— provide entertainment. They are not evil in and of themselves. It's just like the old saying goes, "Guns don't kill people. People with guns kill people."

If all the do-gooders had their way, we'd be playing the "Brady Bunch" game, as Alice trying to get supper cooked before the father comes home or as Greg trying to bean Marsha in the nose with a football. No, that would be too violent. Anyone for Barbie dolls?

Your Horoscope

By Joann Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Work a busier than ever, even if the profits are smaller. Put a secret plan into operation. A money-saving idea could win you a bonus or new perks. Be more realistic about romance.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): Being practical about your personal relationships is difficult. Give yourself more time to decide exactly what you want. You could decide to buy a knockout outfit while shopping with a friend.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): Trust your intuition — something major is in the works. Emotions are building to a fever pitch. Keep a low profile around someone who tends to fly off the handle. Be selective in romance.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): Move with the times and you will make an excellent impression on someone prominent in business circles. A newcomer expresses an interest in you. Your mate is still your most loyal ally.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): As you tackle new projects, surround yourself with trustworthy associates. Careful research pays off when making a presentation. Return favors as quickly as possible. Your love life accelerates. Simplify your financial investments.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): A good day to shop for office supplies or other useful items. An exchange of ideas will benefit shared financial interests. Try something new but practical.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Clamp the lid on extravagance! Performing more services for yourself will save you money. Put your best foot forward when dealing with older relatives. Be diplomatic and tell it like it is!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Someone may want to confide in you. Be sympathetic but avoid getting caught in the middle of a dispute. Your service to the community receives new attention.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): Recent worries evaporate into thin air. Someone involved in a business deal could be unpredictable. The news you get from those at a distance is startling. A recovery is imminent.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): News of a former lover could put you in a pensive mood. Focus on new beginnings. Become an ambassador of goodwill for your community or church. Reach out to someone who is lonely.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Do not worry about going unnoticed. Even when you are not feeling your best, you make an excellent impression. Your quiet charm draws admirers like a magnet. Wear something special this evening.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Tying up loose ends will put your mind at ease. An unexpected check or windfall arrives in the nick of time! Pay bills promptly to protect your credit rating. Romance could be puzzling.

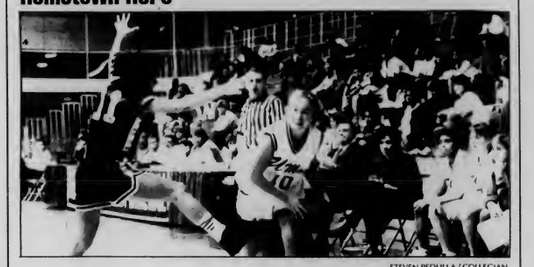
Newcomb credits the seniors on the team for providing the experience necessary to compete and improve.

"(The seniors) were solid, and they deserve a lot of credit," said Newcomb. "A large part of the success is due to the leadership of the senior class."

Overall, UMass won 11 of 16 events in the UNH meet.



With the ECAC's coming up in March, the Minutewomen have 12 representatives at this juncture. The maximum number of swimmers one school can send is 18.

"I'm expecting a great representation of the University with the people we are sending," said Newcomb.

The New England Championships which are held February 3–5 is the last chance swimmers have to qualify themselves.

"Overall this year, we lost two close meets," said Newcomb. "This team is gearing up for what is coming up."

Hockey hosts Cross tonight

By MATT VAUTOUR
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts hockey team is starting to hit on all cylinders as it heads into the homestretch of the season.

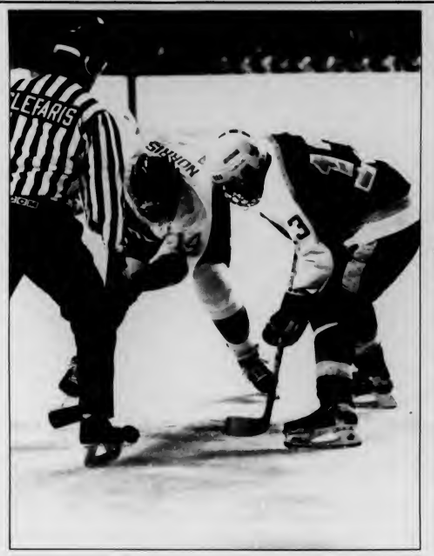
Following an emotional 4–3 victory over Army Saturday night the Minutemen return to the Mullins ice tonight, to play the Crusaders of Holy Cross.

UMass Coach Joe Mallen emphasized that despite the emotional high of coming off their first win against a Division I team and the distractions of the upcoming showdown with Merrimack, the Minutemen will be ready for Holy Cross.

"Having beaten Army takes the monkey off our back in three ways," said Mallen. "We have a Division I win, we guaranteed ourselves a winning season and we won a big game on the road. But we've tried to keep focused and play one game at a time," said Mallen. "After the Army win, we have three games in the next eight days, followed by a nine day break. We're going to try to win these three games, and then we can take a break and try to get ready for the last few weeks of the season.

Holy Cross comes into the game with an 11–6 (8–3 in ECAC East) record, which includes two victories over Connecticut College, to whom UMass lost on January 14. Led by senior forward Mike Shustak (16–21–37) and goalie Kevin Broderick, the Crusaders should contend in the ECAC post season.

"We're looking at a game at least as strong a Salem State, if not stronger," said Mallen. "It's not an easy game and it's not the most difficult game, but it's going to be a real hard game."



The Minuteman defense will be without captain Jaynen Rissling again, who has been sidelined with a knee injury, since January 7. Mallen will continue to use Armand Latulippe, who he moved back to defense in Rissling's absence.

"I've asked our whole team to step it up a little and I think they have," said Mallen. "When we have guys out of the lineup, we've got to pull together, because its still are reputation that's at stake."

With just over three weeks left in the season, Mallen is pleased with his team's performance.

"As far as I'm concerned, we couldn't be any better," said Mallen. "The only thing we could take would be the Connecticut College and the Colby games, but I'll take some wins we've had over the other the other teams in lieu of those losses. We've beaten the top Division III teams in the country. We had a one-goal game with St. Lawrence. We've beaten Army. In ou first year, we've made a significant amount of progress. We're moving the program in the right direction quickly.

One–TImers: Tonight's game will be on WMUA 91.1 with Anthony Guido and Ed Alves calling all the shots.

Bonnies' win gives Baron's boys respect

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

The plane ride to Olean, N.Y., for Atlantic 10 teams was never fun in years past — except for on the court, that is. Despite the weather, lack of night life and tiring trip, playing St. Bonaventure meant one thing: an easy win over the perennial door mat in your league.

Enter the Bonnies of Harry Moore and Shandue McNeil, who now enjoy welcoming A–10 foes to the Reilly Center. St. Bonaventure started 1994 off right, picking up its first conference win since the 1989–90 season — the Bonnies upset George Washington 71–67 when the Colonials were fighting to stay in the Top 25.

Last Saturday, Coach Jim Baron's boys took another step forward. Led by McNeil, the A–10 Freshman of the Week, the Bonnies shocked Gale Catlett and his then–No.19 West Virginia club, 72–66. McNeil averaged 14 points and six assists last week.

"Over the years, the respect [for St. Bonaventure] has been lost. What we're trying to do is rejuvenate that respect. The was you rejuvenate that is to get guys to play hard and play together," said Baron.

The Bonnies missed their chance at knocking Massachusetts off earlier in the season, but Moore, the A– 10's second–leading scorer, and company entertain Temple, another Top 10 squad, on Feb. 16.

• Word through the grapevine is Massachusetts will play in the Starter Tip–Off Classic next year in Springfield versus Nolan Richardson's Arkansas Razorbacks. I guess Coach John Calipari truly believes in scheduling the best.

Corliss Williamson versus Lou Roe. Scottie Thurman one– on–one with Mike Williams. Marcus Camby dunking over Dwight Stewart. It will be a good one, considering both teams could be ranked in the Preseason Top 5.

• A–10 teams will be featured on ABC each weekend in February, beginning with the Massachusetts–Kentucky game. On Feb. 13, the big one, the Minutemen and the Owls in a conference battle, followed by Temple–Louisville and Temple–Duke.

• The race for the Player of the Year in the A–10 has tightened, especially the former. Massachusetts forward Lou Roe jumped way out in front early, but Duquesne's Derrick Alston and St. Bonaventure's Harry Moore have passed Roe and moved one–two in the scoring race. Throw Temple's Aaron McKie and Eddie Jones, who are both averaging 19.3 points per game, into the mix and the battle should go right down to the end of the season.

Despite missing one A–10 game, Massachusetts freshman Marcus Camby is the front–runner to take the Freshman of the Year award home. When he has been on the court against A–10 competition, Camby has been dominating. He should have no problem taking the award home.

Women's gym beaten by Rhode Island

By ANTHONY GUIDO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team came up just short at Rhode Island on Saturday. The Minutewomen scored fairly well in totaling 186.35 points, falling by .42 points to URI.

Massachusetts Coach David Kuzara was disappointed that the squad didn't score higher, yet said that he saw some bright spots from his gymnasts. Kuzara went into the meet aiming at a score of 188, hoping it would have been enough to crack the Top 20.

"We did a lot of good things, but I take complete responsibility for not getting more points. We have a higher skill level, but they performed better," said Kuzara.

The Minutewomen completed January's schedule with a 3– 2 record and were ranked 26 in the last poll. The WRams scored higher in the vault, beam and floor exercises.

Tara Swartz again won the all–around, leading four Minutewomen ahead of URI. Swartz posted a 37.70 and Lianne Laing was second with a score of 37.52. However, Kuzara didn't focus on the individual success; he said he wants the team's effort to be most important.

"Tara won again, but not up to her normal level. I was most pleased with Angela Jent on vault and bars. Also Stephanie Martino is making great strides," Kuzara said.

Martino, a junior, hasn't competed in the last two years. Saturday represented only her second meet after a long absence due to knee surgery. She scored an impressive 9.25 on the beam, second on the team. Nancy Spina led URI with a 9.575 to win beam.

Swartz and Laing led UMass on the vault, both getting a 9.75, not enough to overtake a more balanced Rhode Island. The only event UMass won was bars, with Swartz scoring a 9.60 and Erica Baum with a 9.40.

Shaheda Keels led the Minutewomen in the floor routine with a 9.725. Once again, a more balanced WRam team put up a higher score, led by Erica Allocco's 9.675.

"Every one of our gymnasts fell at least once on the floor exercises," said Kuzara. "We showed the kind of tricks needed to get us into position for the nationals."

A big edge for URI on Saturday was the home crowd advantage. Coming up on Friday, UMass hosts URI in its first home meet of the season.

"We need a big crowd, if people are planning to come and be quiet then stay home. I want a loud and supportive crowd, we need to score big at home," said Kuzara.

Veremy places in three events

By MICHAEL REISS
Collegian Staff

The life a college swimmer can be cruel, yet so rewarding.

Take for example the efforts of University of Massachusetts stalwart swimmer Julie Veremey. With her team well on the way to a convincing triumph over UNH Saturday night, she swam three events in a span of approximately 30 minutes.

First there was the 200–medley relay. Along with Jessica Griffith, Barbara Banks and Sarah Baker, Veremey helped notch a first place finish.

And as Coach Bob Newcomb explained, she didn't have much time to rest after that.

"She came back out of the water, and went right to the starting blocks," he said.

The next race was the 100–freestyle, which Veremey swam in respectable time, chalking up yet another first place performance.

After the 100–freestyle, Veremey caught a quick breather while the divers competed. After the 10–minute break, she was summoned back to the blocks for the grueling 200– butterfly, which is "one of the hardest races to swim," according to Newcomb.

After winning the 200–butterfly, Veremey had pulled off the triple play, placing first in all three events. Although a vigorous 30 minutes, it was certainly a very rewarding stretch for Veremey.

"She's spectacular, an excellent swimmer," said Newcomb. "I'm really encouraged watching what she has done."

The meet also marked the return of Allison White, who was unable to perform last meet due to injury. The senior diver placed first in the one-meter and three-meter competitions.

Distance swimmer Meghan O'Connor also displayed her continuous progress in the pool.

"She's coming into her own," said Newcomb. "She's getting stronger in and out of the water. I think she needed to prove something to herself that she could swim these events. She did spectacular."

Baker, who was also a member of the triumphant 200– medley relay, had first place finishes in the 50–freestyle, 100–freestyle and

The major championship meets of the swimming season are just around the corner, and the University of Massachusetts men's swimming team continued its preparation Saturday by defeating the University of New Hampshire 176–123 in Durham.

The Minutemen dominated the meet to improve their season record to 11–0.

Coach Russ Yarworth used the meet to have his swimmers compete in off events and was pleased with the results.

"They did what I expected them to do," Yarworth said.

The UMass swimmers saw the meet as a opportunity to relax after several big wins, including a win over Connecticut last weekend.

"It was a good outlet after a couple of big wins," Co– captain Sean Clark said. "It's good to relax for a bit."

The Minutemen were led by sophomore Jose Santa, who took first place in two individual events and was part of two first place relay teams.

Santa finished first in the 100–yard backstroke with a time of :56.15 and tied for first with teammate Kerry Hueston in the 50–yard freestyle in :22.33. Santa was part of the 200– yard medley relay team that placed first with a time of 1:39.70 and the 200–yard freestyle relay team that posted a winning time of 1:26.61.

"That's what I expect from a kid with his talent level," Yarworth said.

Other first place finishers for UMass were Jeff Little, who won the 200–yard backstroke, Jeff Shearstone in the 200– yard breaststroke, Sean Clark in the 100–yard freestyle, John Luviano in the 200–yard fly, Bryan Leake in the 100–yard fly and Jeff Wickland who placed first in the 200–yard individual medley.

The New England Championships are two weeks away and all signs indicate that the Minutemen are ready.

"It's important to bite down," Clark said. "We're ready."

Yarworth is just as confident as his team.

"Their more hyped up then any team that I've had," Yarworth said.

Men's track picks up four wins

Minutemen get seven first place finishes at UNH

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's track team earned wins over New Hampshire, Vermont, Holy Cross and Central Connecticut State at UNH on Saturday, boosting its record to 10–6.

The Minutemen recorded seven first place finishes, highlighted by football running back John Johnson's 21–foot, 9.75–inch long jump, the top mark by a UMass team member in 1993–94. Tom Galligani's triple jump of 45–feet, 4.75–inches also could not be matched, nor could freshman Terry O'Neill's 52.7 second effort in the 400–meters, which earned him his first collegiate victory.

"[O'Neill]'s been a solid point scorer, but he was a pleasant surprise today, going right to the front," Coach Ken O'Brien said.

UMass took the top two spos in the high hurdles and the 3000 meters. Adding to O'Neill's win, fellow freshman Ronald Tauro won the high hurdles in 7.7 seconds, and Paul Doyle was second in 7.8. Rick Copley captured the 3000 in 8:52.7, with Chris Povolny right behind him in 8:59.5.

It continued to be a great day for O'Brien's freshmen, as O'Neill, Todd Lewis, Gregory Blake and senior Rob Pedowitz won the 4 x 400 meter relay in 3:32.3.

"We earned our share of first place finishes," O'Brien said. "We really got some of the things we're looking for."

O'Brien said before the meet that he hoped some of his less–impact performers would turn in some higher places, and they did Saturday. Three Minutemen finished in the top five in the 55 meters, as Lionel Benjamin came in second in 6.5 seconds, and Anthony Rachupka and Jonathan Barsanian ran in 6.6, good for fourth and fifth place respectively.

"We knew Benjamin was capable of that kind of performance, but [UMass' placing in the 55 meters] was a real plus," O'Brien said. "At that point in the meet we needed some help, and the 55 got us rolling."

Shotput specialist Marc Lefebvre moved it 49–feet, 7.75 inches. That length was more than four feet better than Lefebvre's closest competitor recorded, and it totally eclipsed the previous best for UMass, a 40 foot, 6 inch mark by Scott Smith. But CCSU's Chris Dukes did Lefebvre one better, earning the top spot with a 50 foot, 1.75 inch shotput.

UMass found two more second place finishes in middle distance events. Blake ran the 200 meters in 24.1 seconds, and Pedowitz took second in the 500 meters with a time of 1:09.6.

SGA sets strategy to fight tuition hike

By JUSTIN DOYLE
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts held a press conference yesterday afternoon in the Campus Center to announce their opposition to any tuition and fee increases in the upcoming year.

David Nunez, SGA president and leader of the Economic Accessibility Task Force, spoke to students and press about the campaign to stop the rate increase in tuition and fees at the University.

A tentative budget passed through the Board of Trustees calls for a 4 percent increase in tuition, Nunez said.

"The number the University has been pushing for is a 4 percent increase which comes out to about $200 more in tuition per student," said Matthew Pavesi, the undergraduate student speaker. "The budget passed is just preliminary."

Nunez is presently enrolled in UMass, but has not paid his bill in full and is in danger of being withdrawn.

"This semester I'm wondering if I can come back, and I'm the student government president," Nunez said. "Right now, I'm not a student because I can't afford to come back here."

Nunez stressed that UMass is becoming too expensive for minorities and the middle class.

"Basically our main goal is to improve the overall quality of the University and make sure that it is accessible to all people, considering that it is a public University," Nunez said. "That has not been happening as of late."

Nunez complained about the high tuition increase in the last five years and its effects on students, including himself. "Our tuition and fees are at a ridiculous proportion," Nunez said. "Since 1988 they have risen 167 percent."

The SGA's agenda to stop the increases will involve both the University and state budget.

"We have a three–pronged attack we want to attempt, because we understand that the University is not the only ones at fault here," Nunez said.

"We are looking for a zero percent tuition increase and a zero percent fee increase," he said. "The second attempt is to fight in the state legislature for a higher appropriation. We are looking for a 7 percent increase. The third is a higher financial aid pool. Right now it is about $67 million; we are looking to get it up to $100 million."

Undergraduate tuition at UMass has risen from $1,296 in 1987–88 to $2,220 in 1993–94, an increase of 71 percent according to the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy.

Nunez and other members of SGA met with Chancellor David K. Scott and his staff yesterday, but the chancellor asked Nunez to keep the meeting confidential. Scott released an official statement responding to the SGA's demands.

"We are very sensitive to student concerns about costs and aware of the difficulties many students face with current levels of tuition and fees. We are looking forward to working with students as we go to the Legislature to try to press our case for additional resources," the statement said.

The University will continue to make its case to the state for its original budget request of $23 million over the current year's budget for the five–campus system, according to the statement from Scott.

Tom Coish, a representative of Local S09, spoke at the conference in support of SGA's campaign to stop the increase in tuition.

"Earlier today, the chapter board, which represents all the members of this campus, voted unanimously to support the students' position that there should be no tuition or fee increases," Coish said.

The Student Senate will meet to discuss action tomorrow night in room 163 of the Campus Center.

Civil rights enforcer chosen

By MICHAEL J. SNIFFEN
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton selected Deval Patrick, who rose from poverty to partner in a prestigious Boston law firm, to be the nation's chief civil rights enforcer Tuesday. Clinton asserted conservative critics of Patrick "don't give a rip about civil rights."

Patrick won immediate praise from rights activists and from members of the Congressional Black Caucus who had been critical of Clinton's failure to fill the Justice Department post during more than a year in office.

Conservatives, however, had opened fire on Patrick as a "stealth Guinier" even before Clinton announced the nomination at the White House.

They tried to link Patrick's views to those of his one–time co–worker, Lani Guinier, Clinton's first nominee to the Justice Department post. Clinton withdrew her nomination last June after conservative criticism of her legal writings, some of which Clinton said surprised even him.

But in the Oval Office on Tuesday, Clinton declared that both Patrick and Guinier "have had distinguished careers in trying to enforce the civil rights laws of the country." And he rebuked critics of Patrick.

"A lot of those people are going to be exposed because they never believed in the civil rights laws, they never believed in equal opportunity, they never lifted a finger to give anybody in the minority race a chance in this country," he said. "If they attack his record, it means just exactly what we've all expected all along: They don't give a rip about civil rights."

Patrick, a native of Chicago's rough south side, brought his wife and two daughters to the ceremony. "I am humbled," he said, "because I know that I am standing here on the shoulders of. . . those courageous advocates of every type and kind who had the guts to stand up in some court somewhere and give the Constitution life."

Cash is available for needy RSOs

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

Most University of Massachusetts Registered Student Organizations do not know about all of the financial resources available to them, the chairman of the Student Government Association Finance Committee said.

SGA Finance Committee Chairman Diego R. Figueroa said the SGA has budgeted $149,434 to fund RSOs this year. The money comes out of the Student Activities Trust Fund, to which every student contributes every year.

SGA Budgets Committee Chairman Jeremy Hathaway said that this year, only 40 out of over 200 RSOs applied for money from the SGA budget, even though every RSO that applies is guaranteed to receive some funding.

"It is in the SGA bylaws that the SGA has to fund every RSO that petitions for money, so long as they have not committed any major infractions such as embezzling money," Hathaway said.

Hathaway said the deadline has already passed for RSOs to submit petitions to receive money from the 1994 budget. But he also said that in addition to the budget money, there is about $250,000 available for organizations to petition for at any time from other sources.

Figueroa said $35,000 of that money comes through the SGA finance committee. Figueroa said in order to receive money from the finance committee, an RSO must submit an application explaining why the group needs money, how much they will need and how the University community will benefit from the event it is sponsoring. The group must also submit a budget with a breakdown of the expenses.

Figueroa said the finance committee, which allocates money to RSOs every week of the semester, looks most favorably on those who are looking for money to have an event that would serve a wide variety of students on campus.

"Our main goal is bringing diversity in activities for students, not just private parties for the RSOs," Figueroa said. "We want the whole community of the University to be positively affected."

Figueroa said finance committee funds have been used to help groups such as the fencing club buy the equipment needed to compete in the NCAA Division I tournament and to fund the Chinese Student Club's celebration of the Chinese New Year.

Figueroa said even though the finance committee is not obligated to fund any groups, it rarely rejects any petitions for money.

"The finance committee has the power to fund or not to fund an RSO," he said. "But we almost never say no. The money is from the students, for the students."

Figueroa said in addition to SGA budget money and finance committee money, RSOs can petition for money from several other organizations on campus. He said the Board of Governors, for example, allocates $53,000 to the Student Affairs Cultural Enrichment Fund, one of the groups that is helping to fund the Chinese New Year celebration.

Figueroa said RSOs can also get money from area governments, the Chancellor's Office, the Dean of Students Office, the Graduate Student Senate, the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, the Interfraternity Council, the Division of Academic Support Services and various other cultural groups. Most of these organizations have offices in the Student Union or Whitmore Administration Building, Figueroa said.

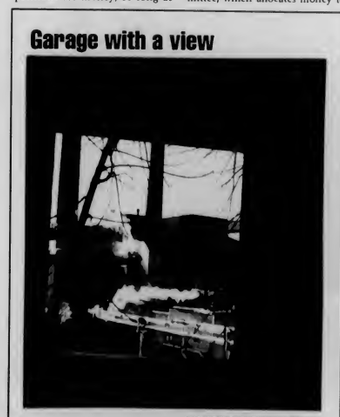
Gillooly pleads guilty; Harding knew of plot

By BOB BAUM
Associated Press

PORTLAND, Ore. — Jeff Gillooly pleaded guilty to racketeering Tuesday and struck a deal with prosecutors to testify that his ex–wife, Tonya Harding, "gave the OK for the assault on Nancy Kerrigan."

Under the deal, Gillooly will be exempt from any other charges, including those that may grow out of a federal investigation. He agreed to serve 24 months in prison and pay $100,000 fine.

Gillooly's lawyer, Ron Hoevet, said his client hoped Harding would also admit her involvement in the plot.



"Jeff has a message for Tonya — he hopes that she will now do what he has done and move quickly to resolve the charges that will surely be brought against her," Hoevet said.

"Denial is no longer plausible," Hoevet said. "The truth about this bizarre crime has now been revealed."

Harding, who is training for the Winter Olympics that begin next week in Norway, issued a statement Tuesday again denying "all media speculation and rumors that suggest that she was involved in the Kerrigan assault."

"Jeff Gillooly's accusations appear to evidence a continued practice of abusive conduct intended to disrupt Tonya Harding's life and destroy her career," the statement said.

Program gives city kids a chance

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Staff

The Bridging Worlds Program is set up to do exactly what it says.

It bridges the world between college students who have made it to kids in the inner city who think they don't have a chance.

The Bridging Worlds Program at the University of Massachusetts was created by basketball tutor Steven Satell. It joins college students and inner–city high school students from Springfield and Lowell in a partnership to foster dreams into realities.

For most high school students in the inner city, college is the farthest option in an environment where violence, drugs, crime and lack of role models are the harsh reality.

Some students don't know how to get into college and many never have heard of the Scholastic Aptitude Tests, Satell said.

In the program, UMass students with backgrounds from the inner cities serve as mentors, tutors and friends to troubled youths. They show the reality of college life and help motivate kids academically.

The program was created a year and a half ago by Satell, and has since doubled in size. This semester, 45 students will target 65 high school youths at Commerce High School in Springfield and Lowell High School.

Satell is a graduate of UMass and was hired as the head tutor for the basketball program. He said he relates to the struggles of minority students because of his own background in the inner city.

"Bridging Worlds takes the strengths of the personal resources at the University and uses them to the benefit of the students and the community," Satell said.

He said the program spawned from his interaction with basketball players and some of their personal "bridges" between themselves and the University. UMass basketball players Lou Roe, Derek Kellog and Kennard Robinson have participated in the program.

The program entails two three–credit classes which can be integrated into any major. The students are required to attend three out of four seminars, write reaction papers, and do required readings along with interaction with high school students. Bridging Worlds will be offered next fall, but students can only take it once.

"I want to influence someone to make the steps where I am, and tell them that they can do it," said Garfield Bruff, a junior participating in the program. According to Satell, most of the minorities in the program get involved because they want to give back to their community.

Mentors take the students to plays, attend cultural events, and prepare a project that they will show to the students. College students go to the high school's community and work alongside them to do a community project.

After every interaction with the youths, mentors write a two–page reaction paper.

Daniel Lizana, a UMass student from Sprinfield involved with the program, thinks the program will help with his "personal syllabus in working with city kids in the schools." Lizana said he wants to give back to his community.

Campus killer case now in jury's hands

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD — A jury on Tuesday began weighing if it should convict campus gunman Wayne Lo as a warped, egomaniacal murderer or acquit him as a victim of an irresistible delusion that he was commanded by God.

The 12–member jury worked through the afternoon and went home for the day without reaching a verdict.

It entered deliberations after closing statements in the Hampden Superior Court trial of Lo, 19, of Billings, Mont. He is accused of murder for a shooting spree that left two people dead and four wounded.

"The crime is revolting, but he is revolting as well," said District Attorney Gerard Downing, his voice rising as he pointed at Lo.

"So he was angry and he was frustrated; so he lashed out. Does it make sense? I suggest to you. . . that we can never make sense of. . . murder," he added.

But Lo's lawyer, Janet Kenton–Walker, said Lo "could no sooner deny God than he could be disobedient to his par-

UMass must stop tuition hikes now

The issue:
Tuition and fees at the University of Massachusetts have gone up 167 percent since 1988.

Our opinion:
As a public university, UMass must be made more accessible by lowering costs and increasing financial aid.

It costs too much to attend the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

The price tag attached to a UMass education continues to go up as the school becomes less and less accessible. As it now stands, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst is the second most expensive public university in the country; only the University of Vermont costs more.

According to the University of Massachusetts Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy (SCERA), the cost of attending UMass has more than doubled in the last five years, jumping 167 percent from $2,048.50 in 1987–88 to $5,467 for 1993–94.

The Higher Education Coordinating Council (HECC) makes a recommendation to the Board of Trustees each year, providing a range within which tuition may be raised for the following year. Last year, HECC recommended tuition be raised between 2 and 4 percent, and the trustees raised tuition the full 4 percent.

Members of the undergraduate Student Government Association met with HECC's leaders last week to discuss a possible tuition increase for the next year. The SGA representatives asked that HECC include a 0 percent tuition increase in the range recommendations. The Board of Trustees could still opt to raise tuition within the range specified by HECC, but would have the option not to raise it at all.

Tuition is not the only higher cost students are faced with; fees have also increased considerably over the last several years. The largest single fee is the Curriculum Fee which was established to offset reductions in state funding to higher education. The Curriculum Fee, which has now grown to $2,055 per year, is essentially tuition disguised as a fee so that UMass can take in more money without having to ask the Board of Trustees for a tuition increase.

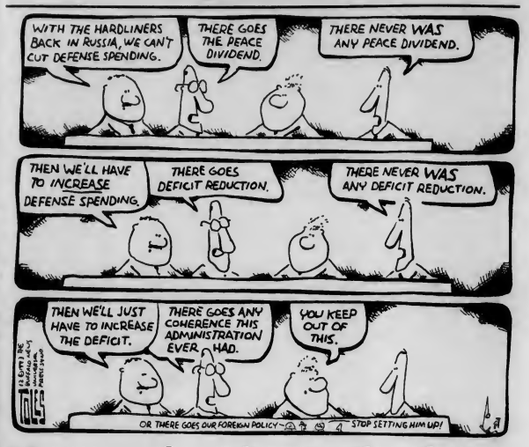
Chancellor David K. Scott met with SGA leaders on Monday to hear their concerns about tuition and fee increases. Scott has pledged to work with student leaders to press the state legislature for an increase in funding.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian recognizes the efforts of the Student Government Association on behalf of UMass students, and shares their concerns about continued tuition and fee increases.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts, once known for its commitment to education, has shown an increasing willingness to put the burden of paying for public higher education squarely on the shoulders of individual students and their families.

Massachusetts has an obligation to provide quality higher education to all the citizens of this state, but as tuition and fees continue to increase and financial aid dries up, the University of Massachusetts is turning into a private institution.

We call upon Chancellor Scott to live up to his promises and work with the SGA to ensure that no further tuition and fee increases are necessary.



We also ask that the Higher Education Coordinating Council and the Board of Trustees remember that the University of Massachusetts is a public university, and that they reject any increase in tuition for 1994–95.

And our elected representatives in Boston, including Gov. William Weld, must reject the notion that public higher education is expendable and must restore funding to the University of Massachusetts system immediately.

If there is one issue that every student on the UMass campus can agree on, it is that tuition and fees must be kept down and the quality of education must improve. During the next several weeks, the SGA will be stepping up their campaign to get students involved in improving the state of higher education in Massachusetts. As UMass students, we must do our part to keep the University of Massachusetts accessible.

Our student leaders have taken the first step. The rest is up to us.

Opinion

Hurray for the underdog

Let's hear it for the loser!

When Dallas outplayed the Buffalo Bills in the second half of Super Bowl XXVIII, nobody, not even Jimmy Jones, was as happy as the Lettermans, Lenos and Conan O' Briens of the world. The Bobbitt jokes just aren't cutting it anymore (sorry); it's time to get the poor ol' Bills back in the monologue. You see, to Americans, futility is funny. Misery, as long as it's yours, not mine, is madcap.

Derek Milosavljevic

While I'm on the subject of late night talk show hosts, one of the funniest Super Bowl commercials was the Chevy Chase spot for some chip. (Does anybody notice the products in these things?) The joke was, Chevy's commercial got cancelled. Low ratings, you know. Just as the Bills are now known as the team that can't hold on to the ball in the big one, Chevy's the guy who can't hold on to a show. Hilarious.

Once upon a time, Americans were said to love the underdog — sports fans in particular. If you had no personal interest, you hoped for the Davids of the sports world to fire their slingshots true. Every dog has its day and we all wanted to see it.

Those days of course seem eons away. Today, Madison Avenue loves a winner, and the people love Madison Avenue. Nowadays we root for the teams with the most sneaker contracts. Before the Air Jordan commercial rocketship lifted off, it was unheard of for a kid from New York, Boston or L.A. to sport a Bulls cap or jacket. Now Bulls gear is standard apparel, at least until this summer, when a new NBA champion will be crowned and a new round of Nike contracts are signed. We have become a nation of fair weather fans.

At the Super Bowl party I attended, I, along with two other brave souls, enjoyed the first half and ended the evening crying by the keg, while the other 30 or so guests cheered and whooped every Buffalo misfortune as though the Bills were Satan's agents on Earth.

These were not transplanted Texans, mind you. Among them they displayed not one piece of Cowboys paraphernalia, no hats, no T-shirts, not so much as a souvenir Cowboys glass, yours free with the purchase of a tank of unleaded. These people just wanted to see the Bills lose again, to the Cowboys, of all people!

People today seem to think that if you root for the underdog or the loser, it will spill over into the rest of your life. If you get caught rooting for the Bills, a man with a Southern accent and rock-solid hair will take your job, and Troy Aikman will steal your girlfriend. Losing is contagious. You can't be a winner and root for a loser.

Of course, nothing could be further from the truth. You win some, and you lose some. Sure, I am a Bills fan and a Red Sox fan. Okay, so maybe I really thought Phoenix could take the Bulls last year. Don't remind me about the Mondale/Ferraro button I wore, or the Dukakis sign I held one November day; I remember. And maybe that NAFTA vote didn't turn out exactly as I had hoped, but losing builds character. And like I always say. . .

Wait till next year.

Military not for the innocent

I read somewhere that the best way to win over an audience is to begin with the saddest event you have experienced. Seeing how this is my first column, I think I'll take this advice and give it a try. What you are about to read is all true.

On June 22, 1988 (a day I will never forget) I entered hell. It was my first day in the military, the U.S. Air Force to be exact. (By the way, a popular misconception is that everyone is a pilot or mechanic in the Air Force. Not true. I never saw, not to mention flew in, a military plane the four years I was in. . . but I digress.)

Martin Brown

There are many horrific aspects to basic training, but I want to tell you what happened to Airman Trask. Trask was a hick from small town in the Midwest. He was an innocent good guy (a boy really) who had never been off the farm. I can remember throughout all the atrocities that happened to him that he had an incredible desire to be in the Air Force. He wouldn't give up, until it was too late.

From the very first night, Trask was picked on. He was a tall, chunky kid with a baby face that invited trouble. The drill instructor had him pegged from the beginning.

Trask was so scared that he sobbed himself to sleep, and sometime during the night he defecated in his bed. The drill instructor ripped Trask to pieces over that. You could tell by the second day the kid wasn't going to make it. It seemed he couldn't do anything right.

Trask couldn't march in cadence. He was pulled aside in front of everyone and completely humiliated. The drill instructor made him put his thumb in his mouth and barraged him for 10 minutes about how stupid and clumsy he was. He then had to walk at the back of the flight with his thumb still in his mouth.

He was starting to crack by the end of the first week. Everyone in the flight hated him because he was so weak. I didn't try to help him — I did nothing. I felt nothing. I was numb. I know this is awful, but I was glad they were picking on him because they overlooked my mistakes.

I will never forget what happened at the beginning of the second week. Up to that point, the drill instructor had been pretty lax on shaving. Unless it was obvious, you could get by, and Trask only had some peach fuzz.

On our first real inspection, everyone was forced to shave. Trask had never done this before, and didn't really understand the logistics of it. What ended up happening is he peeled part of his face off. The scary thing was that on the first stroke he saw that he was taking skin off, but he kept going. By the time I stopped him, he had peeled a good chunk of his left cheek off. Blood was everywhere. When asked why he did that, he said simply that he had to shave.

He was thrown out of the flight soon after and put into a mental ward. We later found out that he was partially retarded. He had to stay there for a couple of months in order to do the paperwork. I saw him in church (I'm agnostic, but it was the only place to get away from the drill instructors) about four weeks later and he looked dead. You could tell by his eyes and face that all life had left him. A few days later I completed basic training and left never to see him again.

I think about Trask and basic training every once in awhile and it really saddens me. The military took a sweet, innocent, good boy and drove him crazy. I did not help Trask when I should have, and in many ways I lost my innocence too. The military made me a very different person; if you're considering joining — think twice.

The voice behind touch–tone add/drop

To the editor:

In his Collegian column dated Feb. 1, Andrew Bryce asked, "Who is the woman that does the add/drop class registrations on the phone?" The woman's name is Charlene Koh, who is a radio announcer for WFCR.

If students would like to hear Ms. Koh say something other than "Enter a two–digit action code," tune in to WFCR (88.5 FM) at 1 p.m. Monday through Friday, when she does the arts reports, or on Saturday mornings when Ms. Koh hosts "Weekend Edition" between 8 and 11 a.m. Ms. Koh also hosts "All Things Considered" from time to time.

Charlene Koh was chosen to be the voice for the registration system as a result of an "audition" that was conducted on campus, where students and faculty listened to five different voices and overwhelmingly voted for Ms. Koh. We have been pleased with the quality of her recordings since installing the touchtone registration system.

Ms. Koh will not be able to assist students with problems associated with adding and dropping courses. If students need help, undergraduates should call 545–5043, Monday– Friday between 8:30 a.m. and 5 p.m. Graduate students can call 545–0024 for assistance.

Political organization invites participants

To the editor:

As the spring semester begins, I would like to take this opportunity to reintroduce you to MassPIRG, give a brief overview of our accomplishments last semester, and let you know about our plans this spring. As you may know, MassPIRG (Massachusetts Student Public Interest Research Group) is a statewide, student–directed environmental and consumer group with 27 college chapters. By voting to pool their resources through a waivable fee, students are able to hire professional staff to help coordinate their efforts on these public interest issues.

Last semester was a busy and successful one for the MassPIRG chapter here at UMass. Students at UMass and across the state gathered over 46,000 of the 87,000 signatures collected statewide calling for a suspension and a referendum on a state law which restricted students' rights to decide how to fund organizations on their campuses.

In addition, students worked to place two initiative questions on the November 1994 state ballot — one to reestablish students' rights to fund organizations that lobby through the use of waivable fees, and the other to reduce corporate spending on ballot campaigns. We also campaigned to strengthen President Clinton's plan to save our ancient forests, and participated in National Hunger and Homelessness Week which consisted of various educational events on campus.

This semester our focus will be on a "Reduce, Reuse, Recycle" campaign. Students will have the opportunity to testify at public hearings for the strengthening of the state's solid waste master plan, to educate and organize the public around this issue, and to plan press conferences and other media events.

MassPIRG interns and volunteers also will continue their work on hunger and homelessness issues. Students will organize and participate in a nationwide "Hunger Clean–Up," a work–a–thon that raises funds for people and organizations in need and gives students and community members the opportunity to improve the community around them. in addition, students will campaign to pass the "Home for All" bill, a comprehensive approach to problems of homelessness and affordable housing for low and moderate income residents of Massachusetts.

We invite you to participate in any of the campaigns we are working on by visiting our office in 423B Student Union or calling 545–0199.

Let your voice be heard!

The Collegian Opinion page is the forum for members of the University of Massachusetts community to have their voices heard.

We welcome and encourage letters to the editor. When writing, please type your letter and keep it to a maximum of 400 words so that we can include a greater variety of opinions on the page.

All letters should include a name, address and phone number (for verification purposes only). Students should also include their year and major. The Collegian reserves the right to edit submissions for grammar, clarity and length.

Send all letters to the Ed/Op page c/o the Collegian, 113 Campus Center, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003. You may also hand–deliver your letters during normal business hours, Monday through Friday, at the Collegian offices — In the basement of the Campus Center on the opposite end from the ATM machines.

–Also, if you are artistically inclined and are interested in putting ink to paper for the Ed/Op page, you might consider becoming an editorial cartoonist for the Collegian. Please contact Mike at 545–1491 for more information or bring samples of your work to the Collegian offices.

Seminar aimed toward aspiring scribes

By ED HUMPHRIES
Collegian Staff

Happy Valley cinephiles take notice. Amidst this "dead of winter," this winter of our heart's discontent, the world of professional film (or rather, the keeper of the independent spirit) will visit the Northampton area for a brief three–day sojourn.

The teacher: independent script doctor and screenwriting instructor Jeff Kitchen. The seminar: "Screenwriting for the Biz without all the Show." The price. . . well, that comes later.

Jeff Kitchen will bring his seminar, what he calls "a group workshop format," to the Hotel Northampton Feb. 4 through Feb. 6. The price of registration is $195. An additional materials fee is also required.

Kitchen's course is a comprehensive workshop offering students an "in house development session" and complete working materials. His course is designed to take a student's film idea down a step–by–step road to flesh out the dramatic elements and potential in the proposition. Because of this and the extreme one–on–one nature of his seminar, he places a limit of thirty students on all his workshops.

Kitchen's credentials include the screenplay for the true Vietnam tale Perfume River, a screenplay now making the rounds in Hollywood, and the screenplay for The Chicago Haymarket Riot, a project potentially earmarked for television movie status. He has served a two–year tenure as dramatic instructor at New York's Negro Ensemble Theater and has taught "Rewriting the Screenplay" at New York's Independent Feature Market.

Kitchen says all that's needed to attend the seminar is a script idea, "something you are thinking about." Kitchen says that when students leave his seminar they can expect to leave "with a working knowledge of how to develop the script. How to develop it, structure it and write it."

Kitchen has prepared three 80–page film analyses of the films Blade Runner, Tootsie and The Godfather for the purpose of his seminars. The films were chosen because they are "current enough to be watched on video frequently and are powerful examples of three genres, the thriller, comedy and drama," said Kitchen.

He illustrates his three–tier teaching model on these scripts to give the student a concrete understanding of his screenwriting method. The student is able to keep these analyses for future reference as well as Kitchen's screenwriting workbook and the book The Thirty–Six Dramatic Situations, a guide to different dramatic dilemnas in the celluloid world.

From Northampton, Kitchen heads to Montreal for another three–day seminar. Down the road, he'd like to direct, but teaching the art of screenwriting remains his steadfast passion.

"It's said that 95 percent of the screenplays submitted to Hollywood

The four–man blues band Sweet Daddy Cool Breeze warmed up the stage that would sizzle later in the evening at Pearl Street Nightclub when the legendary KoKo Taylor sang the blues. Led by Wally Green of Holyoke, the band stirred the audience with the twang of the guitar that seemed to converse with the harmonica.

After Taylor's band, Blues Machine, played three songs of their own, the celebrated blues singer was welcomed onto the stage.

The show was an interactive experience. Responses of, "Oh yeah" and, "you tell it!" were shouted from the audience throughout the concert. Even Koko herself asked the audience, "Can you dig it?"

There was much admiration for the five-time Grammy nominee. The toe-tapping audience nodded their heads in rhythmic unison as if bowing to royalty.

Koko Taylor showed equal love for her fans. In response to cheers she said, "When you make that kind of noise, we don't mind working hard for ya!"

Throughout her 30-year blues career she has been honored with such titles as Chicago's "Legend of the Year." Rolling Stone has also recognized her as a "legendary performer." Most commonly and most accurately, she is called the "Queen of the Blues." Long live the Queen.

Your Horoscope
By Jonne Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Others tend to heap their work on your capable shoulders. Request proper renumeration. A project connected with education or travel captures your imagination. Think twice before buying trendy clothes; conservative styles.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20): You feel more confident of your powers today; others are quick to notice the change. Consolidate recent business gains. If you want entertainment tonight, you know where to find it.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): Play it safe. Stick to known facts and proven figures. Your ESP is powerful; rely on it when plotting career maneuvers and romance moves.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): Be satisfied with competing routine tasks today. Smooth things over with an associate while understanding is at a peak. You may soon be marching to a different beat.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Someone is ready to cooperate with you on a financial matter. A heart-to-heart talk with mate does wonders for your relationship.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): This is no time to play the hermit. Rekindle your interest in the academic life by enrolling in night school or attending a weekend seminar. Refuse to be pressured into vague business deals.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Spend the morning whittling away a backlog of paperwork. You could reap unanticipated financial benefits. Praise loved ones for their dedication. A brilliant idea will bring a bonanza!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Carelessness could make a complicated situation even more difficult. Keep a close eye on those minor details so often overlooked. A family member who offers to help out should be warmly welcomed.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): A highly productive period lies ahead. Make the most of your talents. Your good judgment is reflected in the fundamental soundness of your ideas. Listening to inspiring music helps you relax.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): Seek out the head honcho at a financial institution. You will get better results that way than if you deal with subordinates. In-depth research solves a mystery. Put romance on hold.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Going with the flow at work will promote positive changes. Other people will read your message loud and clear. Emphasize the effect teamwork will have on profits.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Subtle signals tell you that a romantic dream is coming true, or that it is time to make a clean break. Travel looks promising. Phone a dear friend or relative living far away.

man Ted Crowley. The ex- farmhand of the Toronto organization was first-team Hockey East while anchoring the Boston College blueline. The Massachusetts native has size (6-foot-3) and can move the puck well. Look for him to join the Whale after Lillehammer.

• Did anyone see the OT session between the Kings and Rangers last week? With 30 seconds left, Tony Amonte and another New York forward were coming into the L.A. zone on a two-on-one. Amonte was approaching the L.A. bench when King Tony Granato, who was awaiting a line change, reached over the boards and grabbed Amonte, hauling him to the ground.

Amonte was awarded a penalty shot, which he missed. Rangers went on to win despite Granato's version of the "neutral-zone trap."

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO
With tailback John Johnson departing Amherst in May, Massachusetts looked to stockpile talent in recruits for the backfield.

Backfield bolstered with two prize RBs

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts football team is stockpiling players in its backfield, having already snared the best football player in New Hampshire and a top running back from Winthrop.

Tailbacks Matt Jordan of Pinkerton Academy in Derry, N.H., and "Touchdown" Tony Palmer from Winthrop both verbally committed to UMass a week before national letter of intent day.

Jordan, who rushed for over 4,000 yards and 76 TDs at Pinkerton, led his team to the Class I. Championship during the fall. He is currently a member of the undefeated indoor track team.

"I really liked the sport management program at UMass," said Jordan. "Also, I felt their type of offense is best suited for me."

Palmer visited UMass after Jordan had already verbally committed, but the senior who led Winthrop to the Super Bowl last fall and rushed for 5,048 career yards and 59 TDs said that did not deter him.

"I've seen him play and he broke all the records in New Hampshire and I broke the records in Massachusetts," Palmer said. "I think it's good in using more running backs. It doesn't matter who's running the ball as long as the team's winning."

Both Jordan and Palmer admitted that Coach Mike Hodges and staff discussed the fact that UMass could be moved from I–AA to I–A by the time he graduates.

"They said it was a possibility that they would go Division I in the next three or four years," he said. "It did have some bearing on my decision. I'd definitely look at it as a great opportunity for me."

Jordan was named as the player of the year in New Hampshire for his play at tailback and defensive back. He said he would not play defense at UMass.

Palmer is also a star goalie on the Winthrop hockey team, and although Coach Joe Mallen has already recruited a netminder for next season, Palmer said he might give UMass hockey a try.

"I felt so strong about UMass that I cancelled my visit to BU for hockey," he said. "If I can get through football and keep my grades up, I would like to play hockey."

Because of NCAA regulations, Hodges and his staff cannot comment on any recruit until Feb. 2, which is national letter of intent day.

With the graduation of tailback John Johnson and the apparently permanent move of Rene Ingoglia to fullback, Frank Alessio is the only returning tailback who saw quality time last season.

Minutemen beat up on Holy Cross

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Mike Evans and Blair Wagar scored 35 seconds apart and Dave Kilduff stonewalled Holy Cross in the third period as the University of Massachusetts hockey team defeated the Crusaders 4–1 Tuesday night.

UMass	4
Holy Cross	1

Sandwiched between the UMass' outstanding upset win over Division I Army and its impending rematch with Hockey East rival Merrimack was last night's contest with an 11–7 Holy Cross squad at the William D. Mullins Center.

Although the Minutemen said they didn't overlook the Crusaders, they started out slow before conquering their 12th visiting victim in a row.

"We just came out flat," said right wing Steve Corradi. "The win over Army was a big win, but Coach Mallen said we can't afford to overlook anybody on our schedule."

The Minutemen (16–7) came out as physical as they have been all season, checking on both ends of the ice. But it was the Crusaders who had scoring opportunities in the first 20 minutes. The period ended with UMass' power play woes continuing, as the team had a two-man advantage for 30 seconds but was unable to convert.

Evans scored early in the second when he rushed the right side and had a two–on–one with Tom Sheehan. His slapshot into the upper left corner of the net gave the Minutemen a 1–0 advantage.

With Holy Cross caught on its heels on the ensuing faceoff, Bonneau took the puck inside center ice from Blair Manning and threaded a laser pass through a Crusader's skates and onto the stick of a rushing Wagar. Wagar juked HC goalie Kevin Broderick to put UMass up 2–0 at 3:40.

ASt 13:58 of the second, Jim Jensen came around the back of the net on an HC power play to wrist a shot past goalie Dave Kilduff's left skate, making it 2–1. Coach Joe Mallen saw the chippy play at the end of the second (there were seven penalties in the last four minutes), and told his team to settle down. . . or else.

"I was upset. I said, 'Let's point to the scoreboard and stop flapping our gums,'" said Mallen.

The third period goals were big due to their timing. Defenseman Tony Giusto slapped a shot in from the left side following a face-off for his first of the year, putting the Minutemen ahead 3–1 at 2:43.

Kilduff bore down, especially against the number one line of Jensen, Terrence Butt and captain Mike Shustak, stifling the Crusaders' power play chance in the third. After Jensen was called for boarding to erase an HC power play, Bonneau tipped an Armand Latulippe slapshot off a faceoff at 16:59 to put the game away.

"It's funny, you know. Sometimes we need a jolt to get us going," said Kilduff. "I really haven't been happy with myself lately but I thought I played a pretty good game tonight."

Bruins should have kept Andy Moog

The latest complaint to hit this desk is the lack of offense in the NHL this year (All–Star game notwithstanding). Most of the argument centers around the popular use of the neutral zone trap, a tactic that hinders one team from creating any momentum between the blue lines. Coaches from the talented teams say this tactic is killing the game.

Here's a tip for these coaches: figure out a way around it. Your jobs to devise game plans that will render such defensive tactics useless.

The Bruins think they have solved their goaltending problems by hiring Vincent Riendeau. In the past 15 years Boston fans have seen Rogie Vachon, Marco Baron, Mike Moffett, Doug Keans, Pat Riggin, Pete Peeters, Reggie Lemelin, Cleon Daskalakis, Matt DelGuidice, John Blue and Jon Casey. Of this group, only Rogie Vachon won a Stanley Cup. Unfortunately, it was in his pre–mask days with the 1960s Canadiens. The only man who could have taken the Bruins to a Cup was Andy Moog. Moog is the reason that (UGH!) Dallas will have a Stanley Cup before Boston does.

BETWEEN THE PIPES Mike DiLorenzo on the NHL

Speaking of goaltending, when looking at the top netminders in the business, one sees the common link: all of them are home–grown talent. Patrick Roy, Ed Belfour, Felix Potvin, Mike Richter, Curtis Joseph, et. al. all came through their teams' farm systems. The cardinal sin in hockey is for a team to trade away franchise goalies.

Much has been written about it, but the NHL really must do away with the 70–second television timeout. The NHL's version of the bye week, it breaks up the continuity of a game by giving each team the equivalent of four full timeouts per period. Go back to nine 30–second breaks per period.

Have the New York Rangers cornered the market on Olympic talent? Some think so. The Rangers have the rights to US high–scorer Todd Marchent, sniping twins Peter and Chris Ferraro and blueliner Barry Richter. Throw in Canadian netminder and last year's AHL Goalie–of–Year Corey Hirsch and one sees why the Broadway Blues will probably win a gold medal before they win Lord Stanley's Mug.

Speaking of Olympic talent, Hartford made a savvy move by recently acquiring US defense-

Women fighting injuries, take third place

By CANDICE FLEMMING
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's indoor track team has had to overcome numerous injuries so far this season. Many key performers have been out while others have been competing at less than 100 percent.

"As a team we are not full strength," said Coach Julie LaFreniere. "We probably won't be for the entire indoor season, we are missing too many people."

This past weekend at a quad meet held at Dartmouth College, the Minutewomen came in third place with 35 points. Dartmouth came in first with 56 points, Vermont came in second with 48 points and New Hampshire finished last with 13 points.

UMass had three first–place finishes in the meet. Sophomore Megan O'Neill won the 55M hurdles with a personal high of 8.9 seconds, junior Janey Meeks jumped 36' 10 1/2" to easily take first place in the triple jump and freshman Erica Doyle came in first in the 400M with a time of 58.8 seconds. Meeks also usually performs in the high jump but because of sore shins, she did not compete.

"O'Neill did very well in the hurdles. She had a very good day," LaFreniere said.

"One of the better performances was Erica Doyle in the 400M. With 100 meters to go it looked like the other two runners would run right by her, but Erica just fought them off and pulled away, the top three times were very close."

The Minutewomen also had three second–place finishes. Senior Kim Liljebladd was second in the mile with a time of 5:06.6 and freshman Katie Greenia came in second in the 5000M with a time of 18:10.0. UMass' mile relay team placed second with a time of 4:06.17.

"Another very good performance was [Kim] Liljebladd's in the mile," LaFreniere said. "[Kim] was happy with the performance, that's where [Kim] usually can compete, that's where she should be."

Another finisher for UMass was freshman Jesse Rutherford, who jumped a 34' to finish in third place in the triple jump. That event turned out to be UMass' best during the day with Meeks' first place finish and Rutherford's third. Sophomore Jen Waeger came in third in the 800M with a time of 2:21.0 and junior Natalie Hart, who a week earlier broke UMass' indoor shot put record, came in third with a throw of 41'5".

With all the injuries the Minutewomen have, they just have to try their best to be competitive. So far, that is what they have been doing, according to LaFreniere.

"We are doing the best we can with what we have," LaFreniere said.

Senior battles adversity in making women's hoops

By MICHAEL R. DILORENZO
Collegian Staff

There are two paths traveled to the Division–I athletic team.

The first is Scholarship Boulevard. You take this route when the program wants you. Badly.

The other is Walk–On Street. This road is taken when you have the talent, but for one reason or another nobody is knocking down your door. With tons of hard work, though, maybe the coach will notice you.

For senior Jessica Gould, however, the journey to Coach Joanie O'Brien's women's basketball team wasn't that cut– and–dried. Not only was she battling the stigma of no scholarship (read: guarantee of making the team), she fell into the least desirable walk–on category: a senior with no game experience.

No problem, said Gould, as she bulldozed her own trail to the team, walking on as the longest of long-shots. It was a long and difficult road, however.

A high school All–Scholastic in field hockey, basketball and softball, the decision of what college to attend was not an easy one; Gould had numerous scholarship offers to play each sport. Despite citing softball as her favorite sport and basketball as her best one, Gould chose to play field hockey at UMass.

"I wanted to get the decision out of the way," Gould said. "Field hockey was a fall sport and choosing it allowed me to do that."

The decision turned out to be a bad one for Gould, who found the adjustment to Division–I athletics a difficult one.

"I made some great friends, but it was the worst decision I've ever made," she said.

"I was not mentally prepared to sit, and it was tough not being able to contribute like I did in high school."

Gould also battled physical problems while trying to make the basketball team. She blew out her knee in a pick–up game and the long road back included three to five hours of rehab a day. Why would anyone work so hard to play one year?

"I wanted to prove to myself that I could still play on a team," Gould said.

"I wanted to be sure about my knee because I plan on competing athletically the rest of my life."

The 5'9" forward says that, ironically, her field hockey career has helped her understand her role with the basketball Minutewomen.

"[Limited playing time during field hockey] built character," Gould said.

"It also helped that Coach O'Brien told me right off that I'd be a practice player mostly; I try to push the other players hard in practice."

"She knows what Division–I is all about," said O'Brien.

"Her attitude, effort and hard work have rubbed off on the other players. She plays hard all the time and has been a very positive influence."

Gould has also served notice to teammates that practice is her time to shine.

"She kicks my butt every day in practice and forces me to box out better," said sophomore Melissa Gurile. "But off the court she's great, too. She gives us someone to look up to."

Minutemen, Owls lead A–10 race

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

Last season the Atlantic 10 placed four teams in the NCAA Tournament and two teams in the Postseason NIT. While it is definitely too early to tell what A–10 teams will be seeing postseason action, it is not too early to look at the conference race, which is really beginning to heat up.

Massachusetts (16–3), the two–time defending champion of the A–10, stands atop the conference with an 8–0 mark in league play. Despite his team's unblemished record, UMass Coach John Calipari is certainly not ready to proclaim his team as A–10 champs.

"We have got so many tough games on the road it is going to be hard," Calipari said.

Standing right behind the Minutemen in second place are the Temple Owls (13–2), who have run out to a 7–1 conference record. Calipari said he thinks that the Owls, who dropped their only league game to West Virginia at home on Jan. 6, are playing high–quality hoop right now.

"Temple might be back to where they were — as one of the top two or three teams in the country," said Calipari. The only other team with a realistic chance of winning the A–10 is West Virginia (13–3). With a 6–2 league mark, the Mountaineers are in third place but their recent upset loss at St. Bonaventure has severely dampened WVU's title hopes.

The most disappointing team in the A–10 thus far has been George Washington (8–8). Coach Mike Jarvis' club struggled early on and is currently in eighth place in the conference with a 2–6 mark. Despite that record, Jarvis, after a one–point loss at UMass, said the Colonials have begun to find themselves as a team.

"I would hate to be the team that has to play us in the (A– 10) Tournament, and I think John (Calipari) would agree with me on that point," he said.

St. Joseph's (8–8) was another basketball team that came into the season with high hopes as well. However, injuries have decimated Coach John Griffin's club and the Hawks are currently in the A–10 basement at 1–6 in league play. The losses of star shooting guard Bernard Blunt and starting small forward Bernard Jones have really hindered St. Joe's.

Perry assured of confirmation

By SUSANNE M. SCHAFER
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The United States should pursue an aggressive diplomatic effort to avoid a "nightmare scenario" of nuclear war in Korea, William Perry told senators Wednesday at his confirmation hearing to be defense secretary. International sanctions against North Korea could be around the corner, he said.

> "I can't think of anyone who's got the experience and temperament that [Perry] has for this job."
> – Senator Carl Levin

Perry, whose soft-spoken demeanor has become a hallmark, evoked laughter from the Senate Armed Services Committee when he quipped that he would "work very hard to overcome that problem." Sen. Robert Byrd, D–W Va., told him not to apologize, that "the reason you are going to get an overwhelming vote, if not a unanimous vote, is because of who you are."

"I can't think of anyone who's got the experience and temperament that you have for this job, " said Sen. Carl Levin, D–Mich.

Perry, now the No. 2 official at the Pentagon, would replace Les Aspin, who resigned under pressure in December. Aspin stayed on as President Clinton nominated former CIA deputy Bobby Inman, then picked Perry after Inman withdrew.

Perry told the senators he supports sending Patriot missiles to South Korea. He said a final decision by President Clinton awaits consultation with the South Korean government.

The North Koreans have denounced the potential deployment and threatened to respond by withdrawing from an international pact barring development of nuclear weaponry.

The prospect of "the rogue regime of North Korea" adding nuclear weapons to its huge conventional force is a prime example that "old threats can still pose new dangers" in a post–Cold War world, Perry said.

"We are continuing aggressive efforts to deal with this nightmare scenario," he said.

Sen. John McCain, R–Ariz., asked Perry whether the administration was "bordering on appeasement" by offering more carrots than sticks to North Korea.

"I have no objection to carrots," Perry replied. "and there are sticks downstream also. I'm not anxious to precipitate the use of sticks."

Perry said the backed efforts improve China's human rights stance. The issue "would pale in comparison with the prospect of a nuclear war on the Korean peninsula," he said.

Support from China and Japan will be needed should the United Nations approve sanctions, something Perry called "a very big stick" that could be

SGA may audit Housing

Student trustee skeptical about quality of services

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

Responding to numerous complaints about the University of Massachusetts Housing Services, the Student Government Association announced last night that the student trustee may request an audit of Housing Services.

Student Trustee Al Lizana said he is considering the audit of Housing Services because he is skeptical about the quality it is delivering.

"Housing Services is one of the biggest areas of complaint for students on this campus," Lizana said. "Housing Services should be accountable to the people that fund it."

Lizana also said he will study the Housing Services review, in which Housing Services audits itself. He said if he is satisfied with the information yielded from that report, he may find an audit to be unnecessary. Lizana said he will know for sure if the audit will take place by the next University Trustee Board meeting in April.

SGA Speaker Matthew Pavesi said he is anxious to find out why Housing Services is requesting that students pay an extra $70 to live in the dormitories next year. He said Housing Services is asking for the largest increase of any other student service on campus.

"I'd like to know why Housing Services is asking for a $70 increase for next year," Pavesi said. "We're not getting a bigger room or a better room."

Pavesi also said he is interested in finding out how Housing Services used the money it raised from the Residential Alcohol Program (REAP).

Pavesi said REAP was an illegal fee students had to pay when they were written up for a residential alcohol–related violation. He said students had to attend two, eight–hour workshops and pay $85 to attend them. If the student could not pay the fee or missed the workshops, the student was removed from housing. REAP was done away with last year, Pavesi said.

"The REAP fee was illegal, the [University] Trustees should never have approved it," he said. "Housing Services said they were going to put the money into residential education programs, I want to see if they actually did it."

Pavesi said if the SGA decides to go through with the audit, all of its results will be made public.

SGA Senator Jamie Bearse, who represents Field dormitory in the Orchard Hill residential area, said people in his building have complained that Housing Services has been unresponsive. He said his constituents have complained to the Residential Director about a water vein that got dirt in it and uncovered asbestos in some of the bathrooms and have not got any response from them.

Public relations jobs open

By J.M. WHITE

The University Admissions Center is already hiring for the fall semester.

The approximately 50 public relations positions being offered — either as a University tour guide, a student admissions representative, or a summer counselor — are all paid and open to undergraduates from every major. The tour guides and student admissions representatives will start in the fall.

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN
The University Admissions Center

Students in these positions are often the first contact families have when visiting campus. Aside from an ability to relate quickly and comfortably to new people, a successful candidate should have enthusiasm for the University and familiarity with campus resources.

"We're looking for a diverse group of people who represent a microcosm of the university," said Pam Blake, assistant director of undergraduate admissions.

Blake also said the positions will develop skills needed in any career a student might pursue. "The positions are a perfect real–world training ground for students...potential employers look for leadership and confidence and any major will benefit."

Greater familiarity with the University is another benefit of the job, said Kristen Sullivan, a senior majoring in human resources and management.

Sullivan is in her fourth semester as a student admissions representative and feels the job has given her greater access to what she previously saw as a unconquerable university.

"Today I talked to two students from Woburn," Suillivan said, referring to two prospective students who had gotten lost on their way to an appointment with her.

"When they finally got here, the first thing they said was 'It's so big.' Well, it is a big school, but there are ways to make it small....The more you know about [the University] the more intimate it becomes," she said.

"I perceive the students as the best ambassadors of the university," said Arlene Cash, director of admissions, "the students give families the best perspective."

The Admissions Center is also looking for volunteers to work with prospective ALANA (Asian, Latino, Afican American, Native American) students. Volunteers can contribute as many hours as

Service allows students to search for financial aid

By BRANDON FERRIS
Collegian Correspondent

Are you looking for sources of money for college? If so, you might consider using Fund Finder, a scholarship search service being offered to students by the Student Employment Office.

Fund Finder is a software package which matches students' backgrounds and interests with related scholarships and other financial resources. The user provides information about his/her familial, religious and ethnic background, affiliations with various organizations, hobbies and career interests and other personal data.

Fund Finder matches this information with state and national organizations which provide scholarships, grants, loans and internships to students who fulfill their criteria. Its database contains over 3,000 listings, which contain addresses to which students can write for applications.

Unlike many similar commercially offered services, Fund Finder costs nothing to use.

According to Lea Arnold, a graduate assistant in the Student Employment Office, Fund Finder has been available since October 1993, but it is not widely known among students.

The Student Employment Office has four computer terminals on which students can use the program. Arnold said any student can use the service on a walk–in basis during the office's regular hours.

She said the program takes no more than half an hour to use and called it "extremely user–friendly," but added that a consultant is always on duty in the office should students need any assistance. Users may also make free printouts of scholarship information.

There is also a Fund Finder terminal in the main library, which may be used anytime during library hours although no consultant is available. In addition, several departments, including the honors program and University Without Walls, have the program, but its use is restricted to students in these departments.

Arnold said Fund Finder currently does not list local scholarship sources because they are too numerous. She urged students to use other resources, such as the library, in addition to Fund Finder, to seek out the more remote scholarships.

"People should use this as one avenue," she said. "There's a lot of money out there to be had, but people just don't know about it."

Maulana Karenga to visit UMass

Creator of Kwanzaa "focuses on Afro–centric thought"

Karenga has lectured on the life and struggles of African peoples at universities in the United States, Africa, the People's Republic of China, Cuba, Trinidad and Canada.

Karenga is the director and creator of the Institute of Pan– African Studies in Los Angeles and the chair of the Department of Black Studies at California State University, Long Beach. He served as visiting professor at Stanford University, University of California at Riverside and was a Distinguished Visiting Scholar in Black Studies at the University of Nebraska, Omaha.

"He is a very dynamic speaker who focuses on Afro-centric thought," said Micki Lane, a recent graduate in African American Studies at University of California at Irvine. "He spoke in one of my classes and his information and thoughts are straight. His books are very informative."

Karenga is the creator of Kwanzaa, a holiday celebrated by 18 million African Americans based on the first fruits celebration in African tradition. According to the Institute of Pan–African studies, his philosophy of Kawaida is an ongoing synthesis of the best of nationalist, pan Africanist and socialist thought.

Professor Karenga is the author of Introduction to Black Studies, the most widely used intro text in Black Studies. The text is used by over 200 universities and he is also the author of, The Book of Coming Forth By Day: The Ethics of the Declarations of Innocence.

"Karenga is a legend in his own lifetime. He is well respected for his commitment and service to the African American community," said Subira Kifano, the Assistant Director of the African American Culture Center in Los Angeles. "He has kept his commitment but has not lost his cultural grounding. He is a wealth of information."

Karenga has recently completed his second doctorate in Social Ethics at the University of Southern California. He is also the national chairman of Us Organization, a cultural and social change organization.

Pornography on the increase in Moscow

By JULIA RUBIN
Associated Press

MOSCOW — The Cold War era is over and the Hot Times have begun — sidewalk stands full of sexy wares are making Moscow's streets steamy even in the dead of winter.

After seven prudish decades of Communist censorship, pornography is not only above ground, it's gaining ground.

In street stalls, erotic videocassettes recline next to kids' cartoons, porno magazines share the shelf with serious foreign-affairs journals, and sex gadgets are displayed alongside imported coffee and clothing.

And on TV, afternoon soap operas don't cut to commercials when things get steamy — the cameras sometimes follow the naked couple into bed.

Is it honest and healthy, or is it the dark victory of decadence that Marxists warned about? Even those who prize freedom of the press are unsure.

"In the West, there are sharper delineations between erotica and pornography, between hard-core and softer stuff," sociologist Igor Kon, a leading Russian sex expert, said Tuesday.

"Our mass culture was lacking all those distinctions, everything was repressed by the regime, and we're badly prepared. That's clearly dangerous," he said at a forum called "Erotica in the Mass Media: How Much is Too Much?"

The experts at the forum — education and law- enforcement officials, sociologists, journalists — agonized over many of the same questions pornography raises everywhere.

When is it art and when is it smut? Does it contribute to crime and prostitution? Does it prey on women and children?

But they said an unsophisticated audience and the absence of effective regulation make such questions more urgent in Russia.

Under communism, sex education was virtually nonexistent in schools, sex manuals were rare, pornography contraband.

The new government has been slow to introduce sex education in schools. Alexander Kuzyakin of the Education Ministry said he was still trying to find a Russian textbook that explained sex as well as the ones he had seen from France and America.

Kon said Russians need more open information about sex, and that without it pornography is left to teach them as a vulgar and commercialized "artificial reality." Ignorance also increases the danger of AIDS and other sexually

Nude olympics helps T-shirt business

For the last 40 years, Purdue University has held an annual "Nude Olympics." Except this year there has been a great deal of controversy on whether the event should occur or not.

To help promote the continuation of the traditional event, Purdue student James Oswalt printed t-shirts with the slogan "Nude Olympics" and a picture of running, nude men on the shirts.

The administration is trying to stop the event from occurring. Oswalt is hoping the t-shirts will get more students to participate and help continue the tradition.

Students learn at their own pace

At Texas University, a new program has been developed for people who hate sitting in a classroom, or simply can't be there. This new alternative is "distance learning" of correspondence courses.

Correspondence courses able students or parents with children to learn at their own pace without having to attend the class.

The system is used by televised classes through satellite and a compressed video, or conferences over computer modems.

A compressed video is a two-way communication system where the students and professors can communicate live by video and audio channels.

Students persuaded by religious cultists

On Dec. 3, Christy Henderson, a student from Michigan State University, was reported missing by her roommates.

During the search of her disappearance, Henderson's friends told the police she had thought a former boyfriend was stalking her. They also said the day Henderson disappeared, the phone lines were cut and their apartment was broken into.

Henderson's mother told The Boston Globe that her daughter said she was persuaded by religious cultists to go to Spain.

Yet after her picture was broadcast on local television stations, a travel agent recognized Henderson and told the police that she had sold her a one-way ticket to Madrid.

Weight program on campus helps students

At Purdue University, the Student Health Center has a new weight control program for students called "Weigh to Go".

The program lasts seven weeks and will only cost the students $30. The group will meet once a week.

A registered dietician will be available to help the students and to oversee the program. Enrollment is limited to those who are at least 10 pounds or over their average weight range.

Tattoo causes controversy

Jackson Warren, a worker from Iowa State University, has recently been struggling with a great deal of controversy over his Ku Klux Klan tattoo.

Students on campus protested, and would not eat where he worked. Campus officials responded by removing Warren from visible work areas and assigned him to work at the University food storage facility instead.

Officials also revised the employee dress code demanding that food service employees hide all tattoos.

Shortly after, the Iowa attorney general told the officials that their actions violated freedom of speech. Warren said he did not mean to offend anyone.

Hoop tix raffle to benefit medical center

By JUSTIN DOYLE
Collegian Staff

Everyone seems to want tickets to the University of Massachusetts men's basketball games this year except for the Board of Organized Work. They are sponsoring a "Mid- Winter Madness Raffle for UMass Basketball Fanatics."

The main attraction of the raffle are two tickets to the UMass versus West Virginia basketball game at the William D. Mullins Center on Feb. 20. The raffle is benefiting the Franklin Medical Center's Mammography Unit.

"The Franklin Medical Center is a non-profit entity," said Jim Butcher, the director of development and public relations at Franklin. "The hospital provides a lot of non- compensated care."

The Board of Organized Work is Franklin Medical Center's oldest and largest auxiliary. It sponsors fundraisers for the Center throughout the year.

"The Board of Organized Work runs three to four fundraisers a year for the Medical Center," Butcher said. "All the money from the raffle will go to the Mammography Department. We are very appreciative of their work."

The tickets were donated by Dr. Howard Natenshon, a radiologist who works at the Franklin Medical Center. Natenshon, a season ticket holder, not only donated the tickets but also came up with the idea of raffling basketball merchandise.

"There is a tremendous interest in getting the tickets because it is a big game," Natenshon said. "The raffle should generate $500 to $600 for the radiology department at the Center. This is the best raffle we have ever run."

Other prizes in the raffle include a $50 gift certificate to The Deerfield Inn, courtesy of innkeepers Carl and Jane Sabo, a T-shirt and basketball donated by Clarke's Sport Shop, and Men's Basketball Coach John Calipari's T-shirt and poster, courtesy of WHMP Radio.

"A lot of people are into the UMass basketball scene," said DiAnn Speth a Board of Organized Work spokesperson. "There are UMass posters and other paraphernelia in the display windows in the hospital and they attract a lot of attention. There is so much enthusiasm when you come in the hospital."

Tickets for the raffle cost one dollar each or six for five dollars. They are on sale in the Franklin Medical Center Gift Shop from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. and 6:15 p.m. to 8:30 p.m., Monday through Friday. On Saturday tickets will be on sale from 11:30 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. and on Sunday from 1 p.m. to 3 p.m. The ticket drawing will be held at noon on Friday, Feb. 18.

"At Monday morning 259 tickets were sold." Speth said. "We hope to sell 300 to 400 more."

COMEC working for the needy

By JON MORRIS
Collegian Correspondent

As the winter season reminds everybody to bundle up and think of those less fortunate, many people in the valley area appreciate the Commonwealth of Massachusetts Employee's Campaign.

COMEC is a charity organization which collects donations for needy recipients in the valley area.

George Parks, campaign chair of COMEC, said there was a 30-percent increase in participation this season. He also said the program was important because of the great need for charitable help in the area.

"The inclusion of basic charity groups and the nobility of the cause makes it easy to give and show UMass involvement," Parks said.

On Oct. 1, choir professor Horace Boyer and his choir sang "We Are the World" with the Minuteman Marching Band for Band Day in front of 3,000 people. Parks said having Boyer and the choir there for COMEC was "heartwarming."

Due to vigorous participation and an increase in donations, this season's "Caring and Sharing" drive actually surpassed its goal and collected over $157,000.

Faculty and staff retirees gave $6,500 this year and the School of Engineering had an excellent improvement in participation and donations.

Celina Ouelette, campaign manager for COMEC, said she was very happy with this year's results.

"I would really like to get more students involved. They make a difference. The Chancellor has really shown support and commitment," she said.

Ouelette hopes to raise participation next year, and to do more to encourage first-time donors for the 1995 season beginning in October.

"I feel strongly that it is important to do something positive in the community. It showed a good side of the people on this campus during the Minuteman controversy, a positive aspect of the University," Ouelette said.

Those interested in helping with pledges, collection and strategies are encouraged to call Ouelette at 545-4203.

Ouelette said she wants to give thanks on behalf of all those who received donations.

Grades aren't everything

Why do you come to college? I mean, really. Is it to get good grades? When you get your diploma, there isn't a number on it which tells your G.P.A. So for me, that eliminates the importance of grades as far as my chances of getting a good job when I leave Amherst are concerned.

Arthur Stapleton Jr.

Seriously, I'm not saying that grades serve no purpose, but the point of college for me is to learn as much about life now so I can be successful when I get out of this hell-hole ... uh, fine establishment.

I don't plan on going to grad school; if you do, then I hope you have the best G.P.A. possible, because you need a 3.95 (it's an exaggeration) just to make the cut-off, thanks to those great higher-ups. Who are they to say I'm not worthy of getting into their school after I work my ass off as an undergraduate for four years because I didn't get a certain number on my report cards? Well, that's another column.

A professor of mine told me if I encounter someone who is offering me a job that asks for my transcript, I should just pick up my things and go look for another job.

Maybe I'm just upset about some of the grades I received last semester — I do have some suggestions about why grades are still used here at this University as well as others across the country, but they come, and for any of my current or future professors who are reading this, remember: this column has nothing to do with my classes.

• Grades allow some professors to belittle students: Have you ever heard of a professor with a superiority complex? This dunce gave me a D/F on a paper I did last semester. I guess I almost failed, but I performed well enough to pass. Huh? This guy was 80-something years old; I think he wanted me to feel like a five year-old who had just cussed for the first time. Did I learn from this and improve on my next paper?

No, I ended up with a C/D in the class. You tell me how you salvage a class when 40 percent of your grade is a D/F. Next time, put a bar of soap in my mouth for punishment. Don't mess with my grades to prove a point, pal.

• Grades give parents a reason to yell at you: If your parents never saw a report card, what would they ask you on the phone about school? Furthermore, I think every parent should have the attitude about grades that Thornton Melon [Rodney Dangerfield] has in Back To School:

"A, B, C — what's the difference? As long as you're in the top three."

That's what I say — what's the difference?

• Grades help you view your progress in a class and see how much you are actually learning: My friend Jon came up with this one. I guess if you are incompetent, sure, it allows to see how much the teacher thinks you are learning.

Please. There are classes on this very campus that I only attended the first day of the semester and came away with an A/B, and I didn't skip just because they were in Mahar Auditorium. And no, it wasn't Chemistry 101. It was 102.

• Grades are used by professors to keep students from skipping class all semester: I won't bring up the Chem argument again, but think about it: attendance is inversely proportionate to the weather outside and grades have nothing to do with it. Hey, when the campus pond is frozen and you can't walk an inch without falling and making a fool of yourself, the biggest challenge would be getting to class.

Once I'm at class at this time of year, I'm not leaving. But when springtime hits: hello, Totman Field, the Massachusetts softball team and the Southwest Horseshoe; sayonara Bartlett 65 and Thompson 106.

• Grades give you something to shoot for and allow you to reach certain goals: I can't argue with this one. There isn't much more satisfying than getting an A. Or a B. But professors should realize that students have a helluva lot more to worry about than just one class. Most take five a semester, and it just so happens all tests and papers fall on the same day. So be considerate next time a student gives you an excuse — maybe it's a valid one.

All right, I'll set the record straight. I care about my grades — when they are good. I guess it's easy to say, "who cares?" when you receive a D/F. Why stress out? We have a life to live; there's more than making the grade.

UMass climate has changed

BOSTON — Holding placards and led by the strains of the University of Massachusetts Marching Band, some 15,000 people converged on the Boston Common yesterday to protest budget cuts to public higher education.

Students, faculty and staff from 29 colleges and universities statewide as well as concerned parents and community members were on hand for the 11 a.m. rally, which began with a march from the Statehouse and lasted for more than three hours.

Forty-two buses overflowing with some 3,000 cheering protestors embarked from Haigis Mall at 8:15 a.m., fueled by the threat of what may be the fifth wave of budget cuts to public higher education since March of 1988.

Mike Carvalho
Notes from the Campus Center Basement

This story appeared under the headline, "Thousands rally in Hub to protest budget cuts" on the front page of the Collegian on Thursday, Oct. 19, 1989. That was during the first semester of my freshman year, but looking back on it now it seems like it happened at a completely different time and place.

It was more than a free trip to Boston; it was a way to get involved. Can you imagine three or four thousand UMass students joining thousands more from across the state to make their voices heard? The chancellor at the time, Joseph Duffey, called for students to take action to restore funding to higher education, and even arranged for the buses to bring students to the Statehouse.

During the last four years, UMass students have become cynical about where we fit into the political process. An alarmingly small number of UMass students even bother to register to vote, let alone take part in local, state and national elections. A lot of people are pointing at our campus and calling us apathetic.

This semester, students here find themselves in a similar position as we were in back in the fall of 1989. Tuition and fees have gone up to the point where UMass is the second- most expensive public university in the country. More and more students are being turned away from this school not because they couldn't make the grades, but because of financial difficulties. That isn't supposed to happen at a public university.

If you've been reading the Collegian during the past several days, you've seen the articles about the budget problems. You've also seen that some people are trying to do something about the tuition and fee crisis here at UMass.

Keep your eyes peeled over the next several weeks to see what is going to happen to funding here at the flagship university of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Perhaps we will get a chance to prove that UMass students aren't apathetic, that we were just waiting for the right time to get together behind something we all feel strongly about.

Speaking of things UMass students all feel strongly about, tonight's basketball game between Florida State and Massachusetts brings Bobby Sura and the Seminoles to the Mullins Center. Remember Bobby? He's the guy who shoved Mike Williams to the floor during a breakaway layup the last time the two teams met.

That was in Tallahassee, but this time the teams will meet in Amherst. With ESPN broadcasting the game, UMass fans should do everything they can to show Bobby, the 'Noles and fans across the nation how we feel about our Minutemen. And how we feel about cheap, flagrant fouls.

People seem to be getting used to the idea of having a full-sized newspaper to read everyday, even though some people had a problem adjusting to it at first.

Everyone needs to realize that this move really does set us apart from other colleges and universities and should see it as a source of pride for the campus. In one list of 2,200 college newspapers across the country, there are only 38 full-size, broadsheet daily newspapers — 39 counting the Collegian.

Doonesbury

Opinion

Tabloid cases obscure issues

I find it hard to justify the amount of newsprint, film and oxygen that has been used by the media to overpublicize the Tonya Harding/Nancy Kerrigan scandal. It is maddening that the recent earthquake in California, which killed almost sixty people, was practically an afterthought, a side-bar to Tonya Harding's press conference.

A similar case could be made against the media coverage of the Bobbitt trials. The sensationalism of the story trivialized the reality of the issues of spousal rape and domestic violence. The gargantuan proportions to which the story was blown did not help fight domestic violence; rather it made the issue subject to ridicule.

Joy Collins

I do not claim to be unaffected by sensationalism, and I do not want to imply that these stories are of no worth. But I find it extremely disturbing that, while these cases do reflect upon genuine societal problems in this country, we tend to be more interested in the details of particular cases than the overall implications.

These details feed the public's voyeuristic appetite and, as a result, effectively distract our attention from the underlying problems. For example, people have been so busy making jokes about the Bobbitt case and trying to decide exactly when Tonya Harding knew about the assault on Nancy Kerrigan that it doesn't even seem that anyone cares about the real issues at stake.

Such blatant escapism should not be condoned. But it is the media who benefits by teasing our curiosity. They find money and high ratings by feeding our insatiable desire to observe the misfortunes of others. With our continued support and attention, people like John and Lorena Bobbitt, Tonya Harding, Nancy Kerrigan, Jeff Gillooly and Shawn Eckhardt become the stars of a real-life soap opera.

This fame, combined with the discussion and sale of movie rights, makes these people and their situations seem less and less real. I think sensationalism encourages this bizarre "detached viewer's" attitude toward real problems like spousal rape, domestic violence and assault.

It is frightening for me to think that the "mundane" violence that surrounds us everyday is trivialized or ignored by the public unless the incident has extremely unusual elements or happens to involve public figures. What about all the less dramatic or exciting cases of spousal rape, the assaults that happen to people you know, or the domestic violence that happens in your house or neighborhood? Where are the press conferences and the front-page stories? And why don't we care?

Our tolerance to violence is rising like the temperature in hell. In order for us to blink twice at the words rape, murder or violence against women they have to be attached to a story that is atypical at the very least. When the media finishes its work, these stories lose all resemblance to life. People's real lives become our entertainment. Our refusal to acknowledge or deal with the violence is enabled by our need to turn people's painful experiences into made-for-t.v. movies, to turn the hard truth into fiction.

Sensationalism alters our perception of what violence and violent crimes are. By pumping up a true story to larger- than-life proportions, we feel detached from it. By twisting and pushing the threshold of what we consider violence to be, we fail to recognize and act when we see the "less dramatic" forms of violence that infect every day of our lives. As a result, we are becoming passive and blind to the blisters of violence that fester around us.

Joy Collins is the Collegian co-women's issues editor.

A number by any other name

At a time when the University of Massachusetts is excelling in soccer, field hockey and water polo, the Athletic Department got a little too full of itself and left a smudge not only on the sport that has brought them so much attention, but also in the building that has brought them so much acclaim.

Before the big game last Sunday, a crowd of 9,493 people piled into the William D. Mullins Center to watch the Minutemen battle the University of Rhode Island Rams. Before tip-off, Coach John Calipari, Athletic Director Bob Marcum and Chancellor David K. Scott joined in honoring a former UMass basketball player by the name of George Burke.

Nothing much was said about Burke's basketball career besides the fact that he played and his nickname was "Trigger." It was announced, however, that Burke had donated enough money to pay for the establishment of a UMass sports hall of fame.

In a nice gesture, Coach Calipari presented Burke with a basketball signed by the current members of the basketball team — after all, he was a "contributor" to UMass basketball. Burke's jersey was then unveiled high on the rafters of the newly-built Mullins Center.

Justin Doyle

When they pulled back the black cover, it revealed a maroon UMass basketball jersey with the name George "Trigger" Burke on it and the sacred number 32.

Everyone clapped as "Trigger" raised his hand to the crowd as if he were answering a curtain call. I was amazed at the response given to this man from a crowd who knew as little about Burke as I did.

I just stood there looking at the shirt. I could not believe that across from NBA star Julius Erving's number 32 now hung the same number 32 bearing Burke's name. In all my life I have never heard of any team retiring the same number twice. It just is not done in sports.

A number to a sports athlete is as important to him as the game he plays. It represents an athlete as much as his name does. Fans will always remember the numbers worn by great athletes. Jordan wore 23, Bird 33, Dayton 34, Ted Williams 9, and Orr number 4. Just recently the Celtics retired Kevin McHale's number 32. No Celtic who dons the legendary green will ever wear that number again. Nor will the number be retired again, even to honor another player. That would be considered disgraceful to the player who wore the shirt.

According to the Athletic Department, the University did not retire his number, they just honored his contributions by raising his number to the rafters. I have to wonder which contributions they are referring to — athletic or monetary.

Beginning in the 1975-76 season, the team's most valuable player award was named the George Burke Trophy. When Burke contributed money toward a sports hall of fame, they were more than happy to name it after him and honor him by hanging his shirt across from Julius Erving's in a ceremony resembling that of the retirement of a number.

Burke played basketball for UMass in the 1950s, fifteen years before Erving wore the number 32. Erving played for two seasons. In 1970-71, the third-year forward led UMass to a 23-4 record, the Yankee Conference Championship with a 10-0 record, and a bid to the National Invitational Tournament. The 1970-71 season was one of UMass' best ever.

In only two seasons, Erving became the career point leader for UMass, a record that was eventually broken by Lorenzo Sutton and then by Jim McCoy. Erving currently holds 14 individual UMass records. He went on to become an all-star in both the ABA and the NBA. He won the NBA championship in the 1982-83 season.

George "Trigger" Burke also played for two seasons in the 50s. In the 1955-56 season, Burke was one of nine lettermen on a team which finished 17-6, 5-1 in the Yankee Conference. "Trigger" holds no individual records for UMass, but he is ranked 11th in career assists and is second to Erving for the most free throws attempted in one game.

Unimpressive numbers for a man who shares numbers and space with an NBA champion. I guess that proves anyone who wants to pay for it can have their shirt hanging in the William D. Mullins Center.

Players and coaches with better records who have become successful outside UMass have been overlooked by their alma mater. One person that sticks out in my mind is Kentucky Coach Rick Pitino. But then again, how much money has he donated?

NEW YORK — He preached to the converted and the unconvinced. He did Donahue, and Larry King and "Good Morning America." He met with the press...and met with the press...and met with the press again.

Gerry Adams, leader of the legal Sinn Fein political party that is allied with the outlawed Irish Republican Army became America's guest during his 48-hour-visit, ceaselessly putting his own spin on peace in Northern Ireland.

"Mr. Adams... is America's media star of the moment," said The Guardian, a liberal London newspaper. 200 reporters covered his two days of news nonstop stumping.

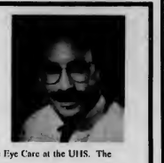
"I come here to engage with people," he said Wednesday on CNN. "I am not trying to force my opinions down people's throats."

Adams, 44, packed more into two days than the typical politician does in two months. All on a trip that was unthinkable for the past two decades, when U.S. officials rejected eight of his visa requests because of rules banning leaders of organizations deemed to be promoters of terrorism.

President Clinton approved a waiver of the rules, granting a special visa so Adams could attend a New York conference on peace in Northern Ireland.

Secretary of State Warren Christopher and the U.S. Embassy in London argued against the visa, but eventually bowed to Clinton's view that Adams' visit would advance the cause of peace, an administration official said.

The mediagenic Adams cajoled and charmed, repeating his message: "We want to take the gun out of Irish politics."



Adams didn't get the ticker-tape parade that Nelson Mandela got when he took the city by storm in 1990 following his release from a South African prison.

His last day featured interviews with Charlie Rose for PBS, and CNBC's Phil Donahue and Gerard Posner.

The only thing missing on this trip was "the sleeping period."

Open Letter to UMass Student Community from the Director of UHS Eye Care Program

Dear Students:

A recent survey indicates that a high percentage of students do not know they can receive Eye Care at the UHS. The purpose of this letter is to invite you to use the UHS Eye Care Program.

My name is Frederick Bloom. I graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1971 and The New England College of Optometry in 1975. Since 1975 I have been affiliated with the UHS Eye Care Program. I am very proud of the program and the high quality eye care delivered to the over 70,000 individuals at the UHS Eye Care Program over the last 18 years.

I have been on the teaching faculty of The New England College of Optometry where I have lectured to practicing optometrists and supervised fourth-year student/clinicians. Recently I co-authored an article with Dr. Abel, a UHS physician, that was published in a national optometry journal. I am also credentialed in diagnostic ocular pharmaceuticals by the Massachusetts Board of Optometry. I have significant experience in all aspects of contact lens fitting and care.

Additionally, we have a well-trained, professional and caring staff with experience in contact lens care and sports vision.

The eye services offered at the UHS include the following:

1. Complete Optometry Examinations that include a health history review, visual acuity testing, refraction ie. eye glass determination, a glaucoma check, cataract screening, contact lens check for those wearing contact lenses and a retina check with pupil dilation, if necessary.
2. Reduced Rates on Spectacle Frames and Lenses from local participating opticians with a complete optometry examination at the UHS.
3. Emergency Eye Care includes the evaluation of eye disease and disorder; these may include, but are not limited to, the following: ocular foreign bodies, conjunctivitis, lid lesions, chemical eye injuries, corneal problems, inflammation of the iris, retinal problems and evaluation of ocular trauma.
4. A Comprehensive Contact Lens service including initial evaluation, fitting if necessary, follow-up care, and same day service on many contact lenses due to our large in-house inventory; all fittings are done by eye doctors experienced in contact fitting and care. We take great pride in being able to fit many people who have had trouble in the past using contact lenses.

Patient feedback of those who have used the UHS Eye Care Program over the years has been consistently excellent.

Again, I invite you to use the UHS Eye Care Program, conveniently located on campus. If you have any questions about our service, or want to make an appointment, please call 549-2671 x244. I look forward to seeing you.

Sincerely,

Frederick H. Bloom

Clinton proposes end to Vietnam embargo

By NANCY BENAC
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — It is one of the quirks of history that it could fall to the president who came of age as a Vietnam war protester to undo a remnant of the war's legacy of distrust.

"This is an issue for the present day," President Clinton said Wednesday as he weighed recommendations to lift the U.S. trade embargo against Vietnam.

Aides said the president was preparing to lift the 19-year- old ban, urged on by U.S. businesses and encouraged by Vietnam's cooperation in helping resolve questions about unaccounted-for American soldiers.

Dogged during the presidential campaign by questions about how he avoided the Vietnam draft, and shadowed in office by strained relations with the military, Clinton would like nothing better than to put the war behind him.

He rejected suggestions that his past would make the decision politically more difficult, saying, "We just have to do what's right." Yet because of who he is the decision could carry special risks.

One administration official, speaking only on condition of anonymity, expressed a fear that "this issue's going to eat us alive."

Such concerns persist although the president got some political cover when the Senate voted last week to support lifting the embargo.

Just as the nation has spent decades coming to grips with its role in Vietnam, so has it been a long, difficult journey for Clinton, who in 1969 write to thank a ROTC recruiter "for saving me from the draft"; by giving him a deferment.

Clinton sought understanding for those who had "come to find themselves still loving their country but loathing the military."

Keenly aware that such a past placed him in a sensitive position on veterans' issues, Clinton came into office talking tough on Vietnam.

He promised to make resolution of the POW-MIA issue "a national priority" by insisting on a full accounting of all those soldiers still listed as missing before normalizing relations with Vietnam.

Kerrigan passes judges' tests on practice ice

DENNIS (AP) — A panel of figure skating judges yesterday pronounced Nancy Kerrigan physically and mentally fit for the Olympics, despite an attack last month that knocked her out of the national championships.

ABC News reported last night, meanwhile, that the U.S. Olympic Committee is planning to hold a hearing next week on Tonya Harding's Olympic eligibility. The skating champion, who has been implicated by her ex-husband Jeff Gillooly in the Kerrigan attack, already is the subject of an investigation by U.S. figure skating authorities.

In Portland, Ore., Gillooly met with investigators at the FBI office one day after pleading guilty to a racketeering charge in the attack. Multnomah County Deputy District Attorney Norm Frink refused to disclose anything about the two-hour session, which also was attended by Gillooly's attorney, Ron Hoevet, except to say that it was "part of the ongoing investigation."

Under the plea bargain, Gillooly will be exempt from further charges in exchange for serving two years in prison, paying a $100,000 fine, and testifying in the case.

Gillooly said Harding gave the go-ahead to carry out the attack by saying, "OK, let's do it." Harding denies any involvement in the attack, in which Gillooly, her bodyguard Shawn Eckhardt, and two other men have been charged.

Although Kerrigan could not skate at the championships in Detroit after the Jan. 6 attack in which her right leg was smashed with a collapsible baton, she was named with Harding to the U. S. Olympic team anyway, contingent upon Wednesday's evaluation of her skating.

"If there were any doubt or any questions about Nancy Kerrigan's skating condition, she answered them for us this afternoon," said Chuck Foster, secretary to the U. S. Olympic Committee and one of the four judges who watched Kerrigan perform at her practice rink. "We expect that she is going to do very well in Norway."

The judges, who watched Kerrigan Wednesday at a closed performance at Tony Kent Arena, said they were impressed by her stamina after she skated her long program twice, which Foster said "people in the best of conditions haven't done."

The Far Side By Gary Larson

"You little softies! When I was your age, I had to crawl 14 inches to the surface and back! Every day! ... Through hardpan, by thunder!"

Your Horoscope
By Joann Dixon

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Changing directions now could slow your progress. Resist looking for easy answers or quick results. You must finish what you start in order to make a financial coup. Rule down to work.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Seize an opportunity to improve an employment situation. New work procedures could give valuable time. Do not be afraid to make mistakes; you will learn from them! Keep to paper and plastic materials.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You know what you want but may have trouble expressing it. Others could misconstrue your intentions. Make certain you get all promises in writing. Consult experts if necessary. An older person brings you good luck.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be a peacemaker at both home and work. If you remain true to your principles, others will be inspired to follow your example. Act steadfast and tastminded every step of the way.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Ask specific questions if things are not going well. The time is right to announce changes that can benefit many. Weigh all suggestions and keep your options open as much as possible.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Curb a tendency to retreat from reality or dwell on the past. Live up to your promises and obligations. Try to fathom the feelings of a loved one who acts up.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Be certain to have all pertinent facts and figures in hand before making a presentation. Someone may challenge you in an attempt to gain the upper hand. Do not take make for granted.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Be grateful for small favors. Your appreciative attitude will prove contagious! Take extra pains with your appearance if attending a business conference. Sign legal papers only after scrutinizing all the small print.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Getting a second job may not be the best answer to a temporary cash shortage. Study your spending habits before making sweeping changes. Keep your eagle eyes focused on long-term personal goals.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Good news arrives involving travel or improved credit terms. Let friends and family know the real you. Make compassion for the needy your hallmark. Reach out to those who deserve a helping hand.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Fine-tune the details of a project to get optimal results. A new alliance flourishes. Deftly merge your resources. Someone with a bit of prestige could decide to aid your efforts. Be appreciative.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Sticking to your principles will help others see the light. An in-depth study explains a new trend. An encouraging message boosts your morale.

• Michael Smith of Providence College is the best rebounder I've ever seen, at any level. Smith has great hands which allow him to secure the board, wide shoulders which allows him to box out much bigger opponents and an ability to take short quick jumps which helps him when battling for a board.

If he had any shot whatsoever, he'd be a lottery pick.

Speaking of PC, I read where Providence Journal columnist Bill Reynolds said that Friar point guard Abdul Abdullah might be the best fast break operator in the land. I have two words for Reynolds: Jason Kidd.

• Vermont's Eddie Benton is college basketball's best kept secret. The Catamount sophomore has already surpassed the 1,000 point plateau and is currently among the nation's leaders in scoring at 28.3 per contest. By the time he's done, records will fall.

Not far behind is Colorado State point guard Ryan Yoder, who leads the country in free throw percentage, can shoot the trey very efficiently and takes over Bobby Hurley's role as college hoops' toughest competitor.

• There's no truth to the rumor that Indiana Coach Bobby Knight has hired Shane Stant to take a whack at Hoosier killer Glenn Robinson.

• Massachusetts can make it 3-0 against the ACC with a "W" tonight. You've come a long way, baby.

Next conference to conquer: the Great Midwest, against whose teams the Minutemen are 0-2 this season.

ARAM COMEAN / COLLEGIAN

Massachusetts point man Derek Kellogg and his backcourt mate Edgar Padilla will have their hands full tonight against Florida State's floor general Charlie Ward, who knows how to pass the rock as well as the pigskin. The Minutemen will be facing the 9-7 Seminoles without the help of junior guard Mike Williams who has been undergoing medical tests since collapsing on the court during the loss to Cincinnati last Thursday.

Seminoles coming to Amherst, Mullins

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

Last year when Massachusetts took on Florida State, it was nothing more than another season opener for Coach John Calipari and his team. It was a game to check out new combinations and see how different players performed on stage.

Tonight's (7:30 p.m., the William D. Mullins Center) meeting between the Minutemen (16–3, 8–0 Atlantic 10) and the Seminoles (9–7, 2–6 Atlantic Coast Conference) will be one of greater importance for UMass, because, according to Calipari, it is the beginning of a tough road ahead.

"The next four games (FSU, Kentucky, Rhode Island and Temple) that we have coming up will probably give us an idea where the season is going," Calipari said. "Is it going to potentially where the upside of the team is, which is pretty high, is it going in that direction? Or is it going a little bit lower than we would all like it to be?"

In last year's contest, the Minutemen held a lead for a good portion of the game before senior forward Doug Edwards (now of the Atlanta Hawks in the NBA) hit some big shots from the floor and free throw line, to give the Seminoles a hard–fought 67–64 victory in Tallahassee.

FSU, which advanced to the Elite Eight in the NCAAs last season, has found the going tough this year. Until their last second, 74–73 victory over Georgia Tech last Saturday, Coach Pat Kennedy has not had a whole lot to smile about.

The recent return of senior point guard Charlie Ward, the Heisman Trophy winning quarterback for the football Seminoles, is one thing that has bolstered Kennedy's spirits. Ward (9.2 points per game, 4.6 assists per game, 3.4 steals per game) in fact hit the winning layup against the Yellow Jackets.

The main focus of the Seminole offense has been junior swingman Bob Sura. An incredible all–around talent who can jump to the moon or knock down three point bombs from anywhere on the court, Sura (21.3 ppg, 8.3 rebounds per game, 5.0 apg, 2.4 spg) has led FSU in scoring in eleven of its sixteen contests this season.

Two freshmen, guard James Collins (11.8 ppg) and center Kirk Luchman (7.1 ppg, 4.6 rpg), have seen their share of action for the Seminoles. Other Seminoles expected to get extended playing time against the Minutemen include senior guard Chuckie Graham, sophomore forward Maurice Robinson and junior center Andre Reid.

The Minutemen will be facing Florida State without the services of junior guard Mike Williams. Williams, who collapsed on the court against Cincinnati last Thursday, sat out Sunday's game against Rhode Island while undergoing tests and is also expected to miss tonight's game unless his medical status is cleared up completely, which is doubtful.

With Williams out of the lineup, freshman guard Edgar Padilla has moved into the point guard slot, while usual starting point, junior Derek Kellogg, has slid over to the shooting guard slot. It was a move which Calipari said has helped out his team's half–court offense.

"It gives us two great passers, as far as being able to feed the post," Calipari said.

Junior forward Lou Roe, UMass' leading scorer at 20.3 ppg, was brought off the bench by Calipari against URI on Sunday and could be the sixth man tonight against the Seminoles as well. The move by Calipari was made in order to fire up Roe, the Minutemen's go–to guy.

Freshman center Marcus Camby started in place of Roe against URI and dazzled the Mullins Center crowd with his skills against the Rams.

No matter what lineup the Minutemen put on the court tonight, however, the whole team knows just what tonight's game marks: the beginning.

The beginning of the tough road that looms ahead.

QB Catterton highlights football signings

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts football team signed 11 players to letters of intent, including five tailbacks and its first recruit from Florida in decades.

Quarterback Anthony Catterton from Orlando (Fla.) Boone High School was sought after by a number of Division I–A programs and was the highlight of a class Coach Mike Hodges called one of his best academically.

Catterton, who threw for 4,521 career yards and 33 touchdowns and rushed for 1,507 yards and 19 TDs, said he wanted to get out of the south and into the offensive backfield.

"I liked UMass academics wise," Catterton said. "The Division I schools all have 6–foot–3–inch quarterbacks and they wanted me to switch to defensive back. UMass is gonna give me a chance to play quarterback.

"If I learn the system, I think I have the ability to go in there and start."

"Four games last year we had one quarterback," said Hodges. "Anthony is a top–notch athlete and a top–notch student. He really likes to run with the ball and now we're three deep at quarterback."

The Collegian reported yesterday that Matt Jordan and Tony Palmer have committed to UMass, and three more tailbacks have signed letters of intent: Jim Pizano from Exeter (Penn.) Wyoming High School, Mike Smith from East Orange, New Jersey and Rich Harrison from Melrose.

"The reason I came here is because I visited UMass, I loved the campus atmosphere, and I really liked what the program offered me," said Pizano, who was recruited by the likes of Temple, West Virginia, Akron and Pitt. "Playing was the big thing. I didn't want to go to a football factory, I don't want to get lost or be redshirted."

Other weaknesses which were shored up were at the outside linebacker position, where Elvis Abellard from Brooklyn (N.Y.) Sheepshead Bay High School and Khari Samuel from Framingham may play immediately.

"One thing you can't coach is speed," said Assistant Coach Jerry Azzinaro. "Elvis has great speed and quickness. He also plays with a desire and intensity that all good linebackers have."

Azzinaro went back to the school where he snagged defensive back Breon Parker last year, Nassau (N.Y.) Community College, to get two more defensive backs, Kory Blackwell and Legista Becford.

"It wasn't a group decision but it just happened that way," said Becford on the decision to attend UMass. "We spoke to Breon and he liked it there. The school seemed pretty fun."

Matt Alegi, who is already enrolled at UMass for the spring, will try to fill the void in the offensive line. Alegi came from Seneca Valley High School in Maryland and was an All–State player. He prepped last year at the U.S. Military Academy Prep School.

MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN

Last season, Massachusetts Football Coach Mike Hodges brought in prize recruit, quarterback Vito Campanile (17). The Minutemen received a slew of letters of intent yesterday for next season.

Say What?

"This is a sound group academically. They can all get it done in the classroom. There were no close calls in the Admissions Office."

Women's hockey notches big win

By MICHAEL R. DILORENZO
Collegian Staff

Sophomore Heather Ahearn scored twice and five other players chipped in with goals as the Massachusetts women's hockey team defeated Amherst College 7–1 yesterday at Orr Rink to record its first–ever victory.

The Minutewomen outshot the Lady Jeffs 56–7 in avenging an earlier 11–0 loss to Amherst and evening their record at 1–1.

Defenseman Tracy Guillemette opened the scoring for the Minutewomen, squeezing one in on the short side of Amherst goalie Fran Ganz at 1:12 of the first. UMass kept the pressure on, firing 19 shots at the Amherst net, but Ganz was spectacular holding the Minutewomen to one goal.

UMass stormed out of the second period gates, scoring twice in the first 2:07 of the period. Ahearn tallied first on a pass from Ali Trotta, and Lisa Panzeri followed to give the Minutewomen a 3–0 lead. Krista Murphy scored at 13:34 and Ahearn's second, late in the period, gave UMass a 5–0 bulge. The ice surface seemed tilted at the Amherst net as UMass outshot the Lady Jeffs, 22–1.

UMass goalie Jodi Whitehead, who tried out for the men's hockey team, lost her shutout at 10:31 of the third as Molly Matthau put one between her pads from the top of the crease.

The resilient Minutewomen pulled away, however, as Kristin Boul netted a wrap–around for a 6–1 lead and Hillary Knowlton scored with just four seconds left for the final margin.

Coach Linda Smith said she was pleased with UMass' second game of the season.

"I was impressed with our improvement. We played good position and passed well. We were much more confident and aggressive," said Smith.

"It was exciting to dominate a game like we did," said Heather Ahearn, the game's first–star.

"My linemates played great; they set me up for two easy goals. If I missed on those shots, they would have been mad."

"We hope to achieve varsity status soon," said Cheri Ruane, the program's founder. "It's a thrill to be doing something at UMass that has never been done before."

Herren may give O'Brien fits off court

Bombs away:

•After his performance in an AAU tournament in Las Vegas last summer in which he was named MVP, Fall River schoolboy Chris Herren was one of the five most sought after guards in the country.

After whittling his wish list down to Wisconsin, Florida, Syracuse and Boston College, the Durfee High star elected to stay close to home and play for Jim O'Brien's Eagles.

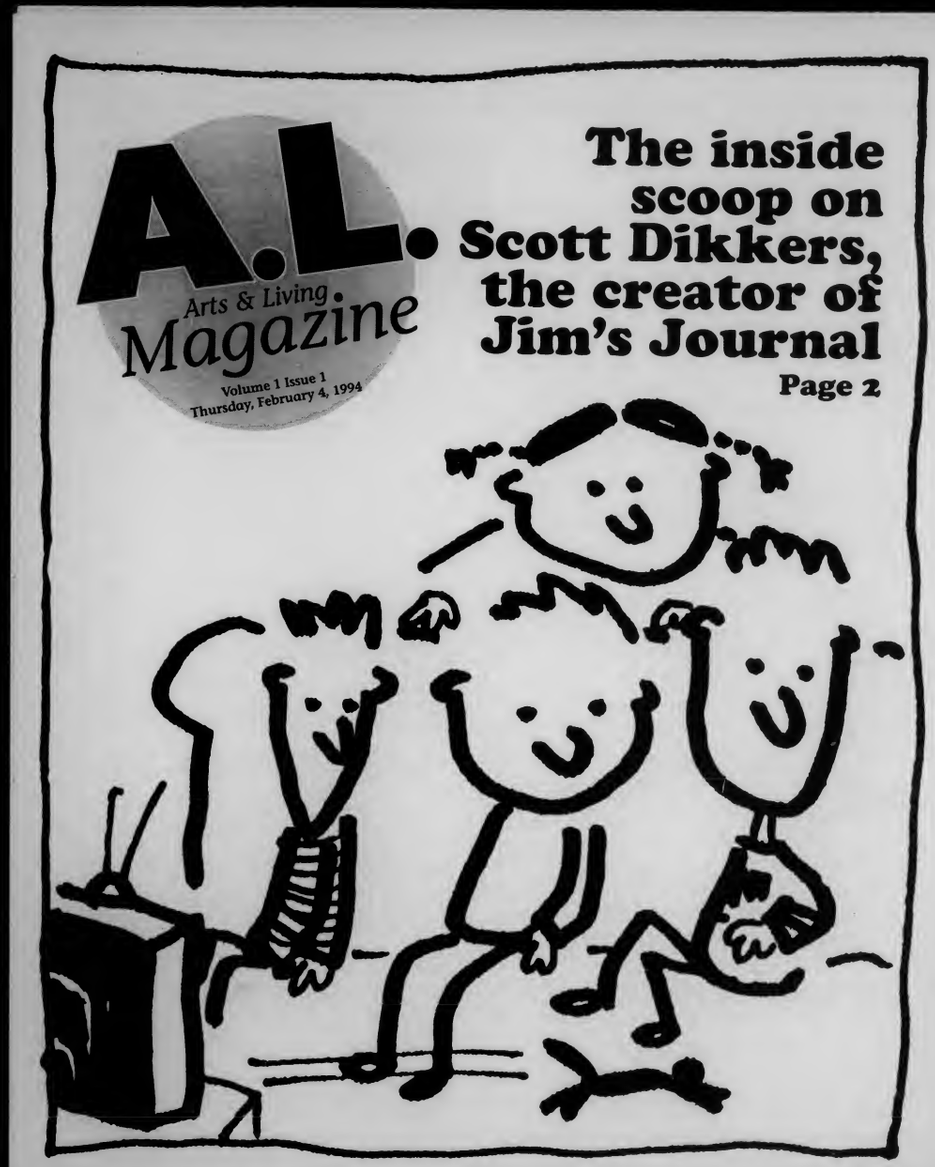
Holding Court NCAA
Sean P. Hayden on NCAA Basketball

At the time, it was a huge signing for O'Brien. Now it appears he is stuck with a poison pill.

Herren has already been suspended from school twice this season — for fighting at a hockey game and for being caught skipping school by his principal — and is also in danger of failing three classes, one of which he has yet to attend.

Don't be surprised if he is not in a BC uniform next year, as O'Brien and the Herren family have a history that spans back to the time Chris's older brother Mike played for the Eagles for two seasons before transferring out because of academic and personal reasons.

O'Brien may have an itchy trigger finger; once bitten...



• All the upsets and parity and revised weekly polls means March may be awful interesting with as many as 12–15 squads having a legitimate shot of getting hot and riding the wave until early April.

Can you imagine the AP voters trying to unscramble this one? They have a difficult enough time with a sport where teams only play 12 times a year.

• Rigoberto Nunez has to be one of the top handful of walk–ons in the country. He is definitely the most intense, and anyone who attends the women's hoop games or the hockey games knows that all that hasn't gone to his head.

Rigo can whoop and holler with the best of them.

Cartoonist reveals origins of innovative strip

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

Today I spoke to Scott Dikkers. He draws "Jim's Journal." He told me all about himself and Jim. I thought it went pretty well.

"Jim's Journal" holds an anomalous place on the cartoon pages of the Collegian and many other college papers like it. With most cartoon strips offering a cut-and-dry funny/not funny approach to humor, Scott Dikkers' minimalist strip stands boldly in the face of cartoon convention, conspicuously letting the question of humor linger like a question of morality. The concept of such a thought- provoking cartoon doesn't sit well with some. Perhaps "Jim's Journal" is the anti-comic.

"[Jim] isn't even trying to be funny because humor is a surprise essentially," said Dikkers, the 28-year-old, ex-University of Southern California student and, dare I say it, cartoon pioneer.

He talks with self-assurance, a smug pride quite ironic for the creator of a comic strip which chronicles America's ultra-mediocre guy. Scott Dikkers seems more humored than astonished that such a simple premise was so well received.

"It's just purposefully parenthetical or uninteresting and the way to achieve that is to have uninteresting average people doing uninteresting average things," said Dikkers of his work.

Consider this innocuous little cast of characters.

Tony is the comic braggart whom Dikkers likes to compare to Ralph Kramden. "He's just such a stinker," said Dikkers. Jim's brash, apartment-mate seldom removes his shades, often wearing a cocky half-grin and boasting proudly of such personal achievements as a perfect basketball shot. "Nuthin' but net!"

Jim's best friend (if he actually has one) is the corpulent, good-spirited Ruth. Always smiling, Ruth is the perpetual optimist and a buffer for the apathies of more mildly moody sorts such as Steve.

The most average guy in the strip, Steve makes vain attempts at humor, struggles for approval and truly gets the blues.

Thankfully, Dikkers can always fall back on the feline antics of Mr. Peterson. Little more than a black scribble, Jim's female kitty (whose lack of endowment was discovered after she was named) is Dikkers' favorite character because "it's just easy as pie to come up with things for a cat to do."

COURTESY SCOTT DIKKERS

"Jim's Journal" creator, Scott Dikkers.

Jim (last name unknown) is the loveable/hateable/couldn't-care-less-aboutable narrator. Once a college student, Jim's departure from academia paralleled that of his illustrator.

Now a passive copy-store worker, the stick-figure legged, three-fingered, mouthless (except when eating), neckless Jim experiences more inactivity than any self-respecting cartoon character deserves. It's not unusual for Jim to spend the first cartoon frame with the recollection, "Today I was bored," followed by three frames of Jim sitting.

And while there is no real-life carbon copy of Jim, Chris Lee, a Korean Taoist friend of Dikkers at USC described by Dikkers as "an existential sponge of a person," served as a physical and dispositional archetype for him. Thanks to Lee and a college lecture which led Dikkers to believe Taoism is "a neat philosophy," Jim's even-keel nature spurs what might be the first Taoist cartoon.

"Jim is enlightened, as pretentious as that may seem, because he's learned that you have to be happy in life regardless of what happens," said Dikkers.

Perhaps this justifies Jim's seeming lack of natural impulses and desires. Jim would probably look upon the topics of human relations and sexuality as pretty interesting and little more. He's never had a girlfriend, never been propositioned – heck Jim's never had a date. But why is Ruth always smiling when Jim's near?

"Well who says they haven't? And who says that Jim and Tony haven't either?

"I didn't want to pigeon-hole him because I think part of [Jim's Taoist ways] probably enters into sex-life too," replied Dikkers. So Jim doesn't smile, doesn't joke and doesn't hook-up – this is a cartoon?

Little wonder this approach doesn't sit too well with some members of the University of Massachusetts campus.

"Many of the students surveyed simply do not enjoy the comic and would like to see it replaced with something more amicable to the students' desires," wrote one disgruntled UMass student last fall to the managing editor of the Collegian. His gripes accompanied a meticulous student survey arguing Jim's dismissal.

"I think people get in an uproar about it being in newspapers ironically because...it's meant to be so pointless that you look at it and wonder why has a space in a newspaper been given to this pointless person's opinion," assuredly rebutted Dikkers when questioned on the survey.

Wading through the masses of opposition, Jim perseveres and thrives on the strength of a loyal following.

Dikkers has published two compilations of his works, I Went to College and it was okay and I Got a Job and it wasn't that bad. Both have sold well and a third, entitled I Made Some Brownies and they were pretty good is tentatively due out early next year.

The visual diary of the mundane activities of a boring fellow somewhere in his early twenties seem to be doing pretty well for a man who just a couple of short years ago was afraid he might "die penniless." But before you go practicing the Tao of Jim, Scott Dikkers would like to remind you, Jim is not real.

"If somebody was like that all the time, they'd be a kook."

Gallery fights to preserve student creativity

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

As a first year student, I remember that the thing about the University of Massachusetts that impressed me most was the fact that the school is primarily run by students, for students. Not a bad motto for a public university that prides itself on being rich in resources and accessible to students from all walks of life.

Unfortunately, budget cuts currently threaten the availability of resources invaluable to students interested in artistic enrichment at UMass.

The Student Union Gallery is one such endangered, campus organization that operates with a focus on students in mind.

"We are in the business of showing students' work," says Suzanne de Vegh, the gallery's publicity director. According to de Vegh, the gallery typically exhibits B.F.A. and M.F.A. projects by UMass students who are usually not ready to show their work in private galleries.

For many art students, the Student Union Gallery provides them the first opportunity to show their work, an experience that de Vegh values highly.

"It's a very important thing for an artist to see his or her work [exhibited] up and unified." De Vegh also feels that criticism from peers, professors and the public is also essential in the creative process.

"You can't really create in isolation," she explains. Sharing his/her work with an audience is a necessary step in the artist's learning process, according to de Vegh, and both the artist and the audience benefit from the experience.

If the gallery is closed, de Vegh fears that art students will no longer have a place to show their work before heading out into the world as independent artists.

De Vegh asserts that the Student Union Gallery, which is funded through the Board of Governors, is one of the least- expensive on-campus galleries (the gallery crew consists of only four guards), with very little overhead.

According to de Vegh, the approximately 25-year-old gallery is the most popular on campus, thanks to its prime location, good wall space and great lighting. In fact, the gallery is typically booked one year in advance.

De Vegh, who is an Art History major, encourages all students to stop by and check out some of the exhibits featured this semester, even if their experience with/knowledge of art is limited.

She emphasizes that the crew members at the gallery are always more than willing to answer ques-

Blink and miss Apted's new movie

By JON LUPO
& ED HUMPHRIES

Madeleine Stowe

The problem with thrillers these days is that we've been down this road so many times, every new film ends up being just a variation of its predecessors. The beautiful victim, the hard-edged hero, the creaky red herrings, the slasher finale, etc. have all become familiar cliches. While the sight of the beautiful heroine walking down a poorly lit hallway certainly provokes suspense, the scares hardly resonate anymore. The thrill is gone.

That's certainly the case in Blink, an erratic, unsatisfying thriller that squanders an intriguing premise with unbelievable characters, hackneyed situations and some of the silliest dialogue to come out of a word processor this year (my own ramblings excluded, of course). Director Michael Apted's (Thunderheart) foray into Hitchcock territory is certainly a bumpy one – the loose ends pile up faster than the body count.

Madeleine Stowe (Short Cuts) plays a woman who undergoes a cornea transplant after being blind since the age of eight. The audience frequently shares Stowe's point of view: a skewed, blurry world of double vision and uncertain perspectives (this doesn't seem to matter when she escapes her apartment through a fire escape). There's also this condition known as delayed perception, which means she'll see something today that won't register until tomorrow (or, as the script would have us believe, years later). This comes in handy when she, er, sees the killer of her upstairs neighbor. A killer, of course, that begins to stalk Stowe.

Enter miscast Aidan Quinn (Benny & Joon), a "dis-dem- dose" tough Chicago cop who naturally is smitten with the independent Stowe. They start going out, if for no other reason that both Stowe and Quinn must have read the script.

Stowe is supposed to be feisty, instead she comes off as a smart-ass who keeps smart-assing her way into dangerous situations – deserted subway stations, deserted parking garages, etc. I'm all for strong heroines, but Apted must have confused independence with stupidity.

There are a number of problems with Blink, the least of which is its nagging, vague logic. The film is structured as a whodunit, but since we have to wait until the characters reveal crucial information, what's the point?

Also, Quinn's police colleagues keep chiding him for spending too much time with Stowe instead of trying to solve the case, as if there's anything he can do– his biggest clue is that Stowe can identify how the killer smelled.

Then there's the reasoning behind Stowe's blindness. It seems that her mother slammed her face into a mirror when she caught her playing with mommy's makeup. We're just thrown this information, and it's never followed up. Questions like why? what happened to her mother? father? remain frustratingly unanswered.

A lot of people in the theater I attended thought Blink was very funny, but seeing Aidan Quinn do a comical striptease for a then-blind Stowe, or listening to second-rate buddy cop banter (including the now-standard irate African-American Captain) seems more like the work of a desperate screenwriter and a careless audience.

Blink's failure to fulfill its narrative promise (so much interesting territory is left unexplored) isn't nearly as disappointing as the fact that, well, it just isn't very scary. While there are a few quick jolts, there's no dread, eerie atmosphere, sense of anxiety or fear. In the tired thriller genre, it's business as usual. C (J.L) Hampshire Six

Intersection — Further chasing bombastic dramatics set at a highpoint in his previous faux tear-jerker For the Boys, director Mark Rydell aims to open the teary flood gates once again with this tale of one man's love for two women and the intersection he comes to in his life.

Balancing a wife (Sharon Stone) with a life with his mistress Lolita Davidovitch, Richard Gere ambles through a silly treatsie on fidelity and true love until he comes to a fateful point of reckoning (the only portion that doesn't smell of Hollywood high concept).

Unfortunately those boardroom suits quickly put a stop to any honest script detours and the ending, while un-Hollywood, comes out a little too pat.

Sommersby fans take caution, morose endings are becoming a Gere staple. D. (E.H.) Mt. Farms Four

Sound advice every week in new column

Once again, it's the start of a new semester; that wonderful time of year when we face new challenges, re- embark on our journeys for knowledge and discover that hot blonde in that 9:05 discussion section who seems to have popped out of nowhere.

Let's face it, with a winter like this, hormones are being suppressed beyond belief. So, wouldn't it be great to have someone completely unbiased to tell you whether or not to approach your discussion section obsession?

?Go Ask Alice?

Or maybe while sitting in your room one night, you and a friend debated for hours on which is better, Sam Adams or Pete's Wicked. It's a thought that's plagued your mind ever since, and for some strange reason, you must know. You need an impartial judge. but where can you find one?

Well, look no further folks! That's right, this is Go Ask Alice, the Collegian's new advice column. Every week, I'll pick trials and tribulations sent by you, dear readers, which will be printed (anonymously, if you prefer) and replied to right here with some good, sound advice.

It's almost like having a new close friend, but I'll never ask you to borrow any money. Plus, wouldn't it just brighten your day to open the Collegian during your boring 9:05 discussion (right alongside your beloved blonde, even) and find your letter in print? At least you'd have something to talk about over lunch.

So don't hesitate! Ask me anything, from which is better; Zig-Zag or Joker to when is too early in a relationship to take someone to the airport. From helping with problems like premature ejaculation (they don't call them "minutemen" around here for nothing) to dealing with an impossible roommate — no questions are too obscure for me.

Get those letters in and keep in mind the next time a friend calls you at three a.m. for advice, don't get mad, tell them to go ask Alice.

Send your letters to "Go Ask Alice" c/o The Collegian 113 Campus Center. Campus mail is free, so you don't even have to waste a stamp.

Editor's note: The writer of Go Ask Alice has no training in psychology, and offers advice on an informal, suggestive basis. Advice printed in this column is not to be considered professional, but merely friendly suggestions from a fellow- student. We ask that letters are written in good taste and address issues pertinent and helpful to the Five College community.

By AMY S. BURNS
Collegian Staff

In A Year In Provence, British writer Peter Mayle recounts his first year as a homeowner in the South of France. Though first published in 1989, this book is currently on the New York Times Paperback Best Seller List (which, by the way, this makes it 25% Off at Atticus/Albion Bookstore in Amherst).

Because Mayle is so appreciative of Provencal French culture, his book is excellent preparation for a trip to the French countryside. Instead of criticizing cultural differences, Mayle thrives on them. When the one-month renovations on his home turn into more than ten months of sawdust and construction, he accustoms himself to the slow Provencal calendar. He is able to relax and go with the flow, without expecting life to be as fast-paced in Provence as it is in London.

Mayle does a particularly good job of describing the cuisine of Provence, he seems to enjoy every new dish put in front of him. This book follows him on his quest for the best food and wine. He thinks nothing of driving to another town, to a renown baker who can tell him the perfect variety of French bread to go with any meal.

Instead of mourning the absence of supermarkets, Mayle delights in visiting the open markets of France. He is definitely not as picky an eater as I am, but his fabulous culinary descriptions made me question my own prejudices against most meats. Mayle's stories, of driving hours from home to try a new restaurant or buy a case of wine directly from the vintner, awakened the adventurer in me. I could empathize with his desire .o taste every kind of wine in Provence.

A Year in Provence will not appeal to everyone. There is no romance or mystery. The only drama is in the worries of everyday life, however Mayle is able to turn most mishaps into amusing anecdotes. This book is not at all deep and for avid travelers and francophiles it should be pretty easy to finish in a weekend.

I found it refreshing to read something so respectful of the French, since often all you hear about is how rude and snobbish they are. Mayle takes care to help the reader understand the passion that the French have for their food and wine.

Mayle's book is a quietly appreciative glimpse of life in Provence through the eyes of someone who can describe it in a way American readers can understand.

tions about the work on display or about art in general. De Vegh also supports the notion that students of all backgrounds and majors should appreciate art.

"Art is not a luxury," she says. "It is a necessity. It is a vital port of any community." De Vegh explains that art tells us about the world, and offers new ways to see things and learn about what it is to be a human being.

"It challenges us to look at ourselves," she says.

Support of such artistic endeavors from university administrators is questionable, in light of their serious threats to close down the Student Union Gallery. De Vegh, however, is hoping to organize a rally to occur in February to gather support for the gallery.

De Vegh suggests that students who wish to show their support of the Student Union Gallery contact the Board of Governors or the Student Government Association.

In order to help with De Vegh's rally, contact her at the gallery at 545-0792. Gallery Director Karen Gustafson may also be contacted.

Upcoming shows include the Midway Graduate Show, beginning Jan. 31, and Jonathan Kohrman's exhibit, "And God Created the Animals and Other Paintings."

Security personnel hired then laid off

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

Students who were recently hired for security positions in campus dormitories were laid off cn Feb. 2 because of major budget cuts, according to student employees.

Lawrence Holmes, associate director of public safety, said there has been a major budget crisis. The result of these cuts will be decreases in student employees.

"We are definitely going to be cutting back on employees. We have to align our budget and then figure out how many workers we need and can have," Holmes said.

He also said they have not made any definite schedules. Security will modify the hours at the beginning of next week.

"We will insure that all buildings will be covered with safety and security workers," he said.

Joy Trovato, a sophomore at UMass, who was hired to work security for Cance Hall at the beginning of the semester. said she was laid off yesterday. She received a message on her machine from her building coordinator Liz Beth Perez.

The message said everyone that just got hired for coordinators and receptionists would be laid off because of massive budget cuts.

It also informed the students there would be only one student receptionist workng at night. Other workers would be on an on-call list based on seniority. Students working last semester would be "bumped from dorm to dorm."

"I am extremely mad at the whole situation. 1 was hired a week and a half ago. I went though a training session and only worked one night before I was fired," Trovato said.

Junior animal science major and coordinator of McNamara dormitory Stephanie Weagle said that all coordinators of student security have been laid off as well.

Coordinators are in charge of the hiring and scheduling of students. They also make sure the students are on time to insure there is security in the dormitories.

"The budget cuts have affected the entire campus, though housing said there is a very high percentage rate that the coordinators' jobs will be reinstated in September," Weagle said.

Weagle said the towers will no longer have four to six people working security at night, but will have only one student. Low rises had two workers and will also now have only one worker.

"It will be very difficult for students now. Some nights will be crazy, especially the towers. It is hard to handle all of the incoming students on your own. Yet, supposedly they will now have more public security officers," she said.

She also said walking escorts will be cut back as a result of the budget decrease. Supervisor positions will be down sized from 10 people to six on campus during the day and evening hours.

Suzanner Scribner, a junior nutrition major, was also laid off from her student security job in Cance dormitory. She was hired in the beginning of the semester.

"It really is not fair. Housing should have figured out their budget before they hired us," Scribner said.

Lo gets life without parole

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD — A jury on Thursday convicted campus gunman Wayne Lo of first-degree murder in a shooting rampage at an isolated college in western Massachusetts.

Lo, 19, of Billings, Mont., was immediately sentenced to life in prison without parole by Judge Daniel Ford.

Lo opened fire Dec. 14, 1992, at Simon's Rock College of Bard in Great Barrington, where he was a student. Two people were killed and four were wounded.

"I think the complete answer of a motive will always be something of a mystery," said prosecutor Gerard Downing.

Lo, a Taiwanese national who was a promising classical violinist, was convicted of two counts of first-degree murder. He also was convicted of attempted murder and assault.

A 12-person Hampden County Superior Court jury deliberated 18 hours over three days before returning the verdicts. The trial was moved from Berkshire County because of pre-trial publicity.

Defense witnesses testified that Lo was suffering from schizophrenia and believed that God had told him to cleanse the campus of homosexuality, drug abuse and lying.

She said Lo "could no sooner deny God than he could be disobedient to his parents."

Lo, who did not testify in his own defense, listened impassively as the verdicts were read and Ford imposed the sentence.

But campus security guard Teresa Beavers, who was wounded in the rampage, clutched a handkerchief

Karenga calls for unity and dignity

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Staff

Professor Maulana Karenga, African-American scholar and creator of Kwanzaa, spoke to a crowded room in the campus center last night and called for a unity among all peoples.

Karenga is head of the Black studies department at California State University at Long Beach and the director of the Institute of Pan-African Studies in Los Angles. Karenga is the author of "Introduction to Black Studies," the most widely used text in African-American studies.

His discussion highlighted many subjects for African- Americans and cited issues such as history, unity and dignity for all African peoples.

Karenga said that freedom is a collective concept and that Euro-centrism took humanity away from African people by denying them their history. He centered Egypt as "the light of the world" and of Africa as the first civilization with medicine, enlightened thought and spirituality.

"We had been listed out of our history by others and made a footnote in their history," said Karenga. "We must go back to Black — go back to African history."

According to Karenga, the fundamental principals of the Kwanzaa holiday are a gathering of people, a reverence for the creator, commitment to the highest values, celebration of the past and of good.

The gathering of people calls for a unity of African people regardless of class and religion. He called the Kwanzaa holiday a chance 'or African people to "come home culturally" and a time to forgive and forget.

Karenga called for a spiritual dignity amongst people. He said that humanity as a whole must do what is of value and do good for others. He stated that the ancient African philosophies preached a "constant flow of good" and revered nature and its teachings as "the fundamental ground we stand on."

Karenga's comments and energetic speaking often spawned frequent outbursts of applause from the audience.

Karenga celebrates the past and honors African-Americans who "built and struggled so that we can live better lives." Karenga then spoke of Malcolm X, Martin Luther King, Jr., Harriet Tubman and Sojourner Truth as examples of self- respect and role models for African-Americans.

Karenga then focused on African history. He divided the history into three periods: classical, holocaust of slavery, and the re-affirmation of Africans in the 1960s.

"African people must speak their own special human, social and cultural truth," said Karenga.

"I thought his talk was very inspirational for students of color who have almost given up hope," said Demetria Bridges, an HRTA major from Washington.

"I thought it was important for students to get a grasp of a celebration that is a part of our culture," said Shamele Straughter, a BDIC major from Washington.

Israeli minister arrives in Boston

By PAUL A. SARKIS
Collegian Correspondent

Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres wound up his highly publicized visit to the Boston area Thursday with a question and answer session at Harvard University. The event was also televised via satellite at the Language Resource Center in Herter.

See related story, page 3

As Peres wound his way through speeches and press conferences in the Bay State, he was faced with issues concerning the Arab-Israeli Peace Accord, in particular the time table for its implementation.

Peres began his Harvard visit by explaining that he would simply be holding a question and answer session with the Harvard students.

In the session, Peres was forced to cover a wide variety of topics, in which he depicted Israel as pro-peace and pro-democracy.

When the question of the recent Arab-Israeli Peace Accord was posed, he replied, "the Jewish history is 4,000 years old, never in that time have we dominated another people, and we don't intend to begin now."

Peres expounded on the point later in the discussion when he said there was "no chance for Israeli peace (without) Middle East Peace."

On a social level, Peres appealed to the Jewish youth of America to learn the Hebrew language, and continue the Ancient culture beyond the Space Age.

He also addressed ecological issues, calling for the "irrigation of the Middle East," which is being swallowed up by desert, in order to retain the ability to provide for its children and solidify its future on the world scene.

The telecast was sponsored by the Hillel House at UMass in an effort to expose events, such as the Arab-Israeli Peace Plan, according to Robyn Novick, the head of the Students' Alliance for Israel.

She said events such as this enable students to experience and understand the "unique time in history" in which they

Smith head to exit

Dunn hopes for post in gov't.

NORTHAMPTON (AP) — President Mary Maples Dunn, who sheperded Smith College through a weak economy and promoted cultural diversity at the elite women's school, said Thursday she will step down in mid-1995.

"Nothing else in my career has been as rewarding and satisfying. But 10 years seems about right," she said.

Dunn, 62, a historian with top academic credentials and a next-door neighbor's easy manner, took over as president in 1985.

She is credited with helping the college keep its budget balanced while many schools struggled, and with advancing multiculturalism among the school's 2,600 undergraduates. She has also taught women's history at the school.

"She has been a remarkable leader in demanding times," said Phoebe Lewis, chairwoman of the college's board of trustees. "She has presided over the affairs of Smith with humor, understanding, common sense and a profound respect for the human condition."

Robert Merritt, dean of the faculty, praised Dunn for bringing on a team of high-quality

Auto insurance hikes predicted in Mass.

By JONATHAN YENKIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — The insurance industry, which opposed an auto insurance bill approved by the Senate, stepped up its attack Thursday by predicting the legislation would add $119 to the average premium.

The bill, which cleared the Senate last month and was backed by lawyers' groups, would lift current restrictions for filing personal injury lawsuits. Supporters, including some consumer advocates, said it would hold down rates by eliminating a current system that encourages people to inflate medical bills.

The legislation also would end one type of coverage that provides about $300 million in premiums to auto insurance companies.

But the Automobile Insurers Bureau of Massachusetts calculated that the bill would lead to a 13 percent increase on insurance premiums, which already are among the highest in the country. That would translate to an additional cost of $390 million for Massachusetts policy holders.

"I challenge anyone who believes more lawsuits are going to cost less money," said David Finnegan of the Domestic Auto Insurers of Massachusetts.

But Edward Kelly, executive director of Citizen Action in

Students meet black bears

Wildlife Society sponsors many different activities

By BEN GEMAN
Collegian Staff

Mike Mayer, president of the Wildlife Society, has been known to count black bears in the Pioneer Valley in his spare time.

Like all members of the Wildlife Society, a Registered Student Organization (RSO) on campus since 1968, he's very interested in wildlife and the outdoors.

The organization, open to any student in the Five-College system, provides an educational forum in which members can act on their interest in nature.

Group members, many of them wildlife biology majors, are given the opportunity to gain practical experience through membership in the organization.

"We like to get people out in the field and get hands-on experience," said Mayer.

In the past, group members have been involved with programs such as local black bear population studies and porcupine studies in the Quabbin Resevoir area.

Other programs have included events such as educational hikes led by naturalists in local conservation areas.

The Wildlife Society also provides a forum in which members are brought into contact with faculty members and graduate students.

Each year the Wildlife Society invites graduate students to contact its members when they need assistance in research and data collection.

This program, Mayer notes, has been successful in giving students another avenue in which they can pursue field experience.

"We get an awful lot of support from graduate students and faculty members," said Mayer.

The Wildlife Society also hosts speakers and each year engages in fund-raising activities which benefit wildlife- oriented organizations.

Last year the group donated approximately $275 to the Miami Zoo and this year plans to give support to organizations dedicated to the preservation of wolf populations.

Group membership has been booming, according to Mayer.

"This year we're just amazed at how many people are showing up," said Mayer.

Interested students can contact Mayer at 549-7525.

administrators in lower- level spots. "I think the college is in a really strong position for the future, and I think that's a good time to be looking for a new president," he said.

But her tenure has not been without some social turmoil. In one campus incident in 1989, four Black women received anonymous racist letters. They gave rise to a wave of protest rallies and anonymous anti-White notes.

Dunn said she intends to step down in July 1995, when her contract expires. But she said she will leave sooner if she gains the top post at the National Archives. She is a finalist for the job.

She is also considering acting as a consultant to colleges and universities on restructuring. She said she is thinking about returning to teaching as well in the Philadelphia area, where she has kept a home.

She is married to Richard Dunn, a history professor at the University of Pennsylvania.

"This is a stressful job," she said. "I think that I've been a creative and resourceful leader, but I'm beginning to see problems come around for the second time, and then you wonder if you can be as creative and resourceful the second time around."

and cried as the jury delivered its decision.

Beavers, who was shot twice in the side, now uses a wheelchair while awaiting hip replacement surgery.

She applauded jurors for rejecting the insanity defense.

"I'm very relieved. I'm glad the jury was able to see through everything that was being fed to them," she said.

She said Lo's parents, who were present at the trial, apologized to her in court.

"The Los are just as much victims as the rest of us," said Beavers.

"I feel their pain," she said.

Lo stalked across campus in a 20-minute sweep, dispassionately shooting his victims.

First, he shot Beavers twice at pointblank range. Then he shot and killed professor Nacunan Saez and student Galen Gibson, 17, before wounding Thomas McElderry, 20, Matthew David, 19, and Joshua Faber, 15.

Gibson's father made an impassioned speech in court before the sentencing.

"He was everything his murderer was not – flexible, forgiving and nurturing," said Gregor Gibson.

The trial began Jan. 5 and included 61 witnesses. Lo's lawyers, who didn't deny he shot six, described him as a tortured loner.

Clinton ends Vietnam embargo

By GEORGE GEDDA
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Moving to ease an emotional legacy from a divisive war, President Clinton on Thursday lifted the 19-year U.S. trade embargo against Vietnam.

Clinton said he was taking the step convinced that it will further efforts to get a full accounting of the Americans missing in Vietnam.

"We would lose leverage if there were no forward movement," Clinton said. He said in recent months there had been much progress in accounting for 2,238 American MIAs and POWs in Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia.

Vietnam is one of Asia's fastest-growing markets and nearly all other Western countries that had once joined in the embargo have re-established commercial ties with the communist nation.

American businessmen have pressed for an end to the embargo.

"I want to be clear. These actions do not constitute a normalization of our relationship. We must have more progress, more cooperation, and more answers," Clinton said.

Clinton also said he would establish a U.S. liaison office.

Clinton made the announcement after meeting with representatives of the families of soldiers still missing in action. Many veteran groups preferred that he keep the embargo in place to encourage continued Vietnamese cooperation in accounting for missing servicemen.

Clinton said: "I am absolutely convinced it offers the best way to resolve the fate of those who remain missing and about those about whom we are not sure."

Clinton's efforts to avoid military service during the Vietnam War made his decision all the more sensitive. Clinton said that every American of his age knew someone who died or was wounded in the fighting.

As a student a generation ago, Clinton marched against the war and also avoided the draft.

There is a strong suspicion among many MIA family members and veterans groups that some of the missing are still alive, but the administration has said there is no credible evidence of that.

Immigrating Jews receive praise

By KATHARINE WEBSTER
Associated Press

BOSTON — Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres on Thursday praised American Jews planning to immigrate to Israel and predicted his country's economy would boom as Arab-Israeli peace agreements open borders and increase trade.

"The economic situation . . . looks promising for the future. All we are waiting for is you," Peres told a group of New Englanders planning to immigrate.

But at least one recent immigrant, Karine Bolton, 24, said she is afraid the predicted economic boom will change the character of Jerusalem as developers start building more hotels and commercial buildings.

"Israel is going to start developing faster than anyone can imagine," Bolton said. "My main concern is that the city I love is going to make rapid leaps into the 21st century, and I hope it keeps some of its old world charm."

Peres asked a young couple planning to immigrate how long they had been married and whether they had children.

When Anders and Adee Strom, of Brookline, answered no, Peres responded: "Why so lazy?"

Sheila Brody, 44, of Southbridge, presented Peres with a copy of The Not Just Chicken Soup Cookbook authored by the Worcester chapter of Hadassah, a Jewish women's organization.

Brody's family hopes to move to Israel "before any more winters occur," she said. She and her husband and their two children, ages 6 and 10, are learning Hebrew and her husband is seeking a job abroad.

"I have great hopes over the next few years that (our children) get a chance to grow up there — it's a very loving place for children — and that when they grow up it will be a peaceful home," she said.

Sarabeth Lukin, former editor and publisher of The Jewish Times, sold the Boston-based paper and her house on Monday and plans to move permanently to Tel Aviv with her husband and two children in two weeks, in part because her 23-year-old son is autistic, she said.

"The environment for special needs adults is better in Israel," because many Israelis are disabled war veterans or refugees, Lukin said. "The level of expertise in Israel is lower, but the level of caring is higher."

Lukin said the peace negotiations had no effect on her family's decision to move.

"I lived in Israel when Jerusalem was a divided city and Jordanians shot from holy places. I lived in Israel when Syrians shot settlers in the Jordan Valley," she said. "I think the peace process only enhances our decision to live there, but we would have gone anyway."

Earlier in the day at a press conference, Peres said Israel hopes to reach agreement soon with the PLO about releasing thousands of Palestinian political prisoners.

"Palestinians in detention . . . is an issue of negotiations," Peres said, saying the question was on the agenda and he expected an agreement within weeks.

But Ahmed Tibi, an adviser to PLO chief Yasser Arafat, said he had not heard of any anticipated deal on the prisoners.

Rene Ferber, the United Nations' "special rapporteur" on human rights, the first such observer to visit the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip in 25 years, on Wednesday called on Israel to release 12,000 political prisoners.

But Peres said that figure was a year old and many prisoners, including teenage boys, the old and the sick, had been released.

Peres said he was visiting the United States now to report first-hand where the Israeli government stands.

"We are not just in the business of negotiations, but we are in a period of making a moral choice," Peres said.

"I feel that we negotiate with ourselves not less than with the Palestinians. . . to return ourselves to a Jewish tradition which is more than 4,000 years old: We have never attempted to dominate another people in the past and we don't want to do so in the future," he said.

Adams draws ire after U.S. visit

Leader returns to Northern Ireland with Brits mad

By SHAWN POGATCHNIK
Associated Press

LONDON — Relations between Britain and the United States have undeniably soured because of Gerry Adams' headline-grabbing visit to New York, but the British are aiming most of their fire at the Sinn Fein leader rather than Washington.

Moving Thursday to seize back the public-relations spotlight, Britain likened Adams, head of the IRA's main political allies, to Hitler's chief propagandist. It also suggested it would push ahead with reforms in Northern Ireland.

Sir Patrick Mayhew, Britain's top official in the province, said he would introduce within two weeks an outline plan aimed at bringing peace to Northern Ireland cannot and will not wait for Sinn Fein," Prime Minister John Major told Parliament.

In New York this week, Adams portrayed himself as Northern Ireland's chief peace-maker. He refused to say whether he would persuade the IRA to lay down its arms.

In a Dec. 15 declaration, the British and Irish governments offered to allow Sinn Fein into peace talks if the Irish Republican Army ended its 23-year campaign against British rule in Northern Ireland.

The British worked hard behind the scenes to prevent Adams' U.S. trip, but they want to keep private their anger with President Clinton and those U.S. politicians who successfully argued for his special 48-hour visa.

Adams had been denied a visa eight times because Sinn Fein, though a legal party, is linked to the IRA and its violent campaign against British rule.

The U.S. ambassador to Britain, Raymond Seitz, was summoned to Major's official residence Tuesday. He acknowledged Wednesday the visa debate had caused "a big tussle" in the Clinton administration.

U.S. government spokesmen defended the president's decision by saying the visa could serve as a "carrot" for Adams to seek peace.

British officials say it will encourage Adams not to compromise.

A senior official in Britain's Foreign Office said Major wanted to avoid a "public row" with America. But he added that the visa effectively let Adams "play the democrat" while the IRA went on with its violent campaign.

Sir Robin Renwick, Britain's ambassador to the United States, said Thursday on CNN that Adams' "extraordinary propaganda line" reminded him of Hitler's propaganda minister, Joseph Goebbels.

"The line is, 'I want peace,'" Renwick said.

The Adams visit has left the protagonists talking, in effect, about two different peace initiatives.

To Mayhew, the British-Irish declaration offered the IRA- Sinn Fein leadership the only concession it needs — a seat at a talks table in exchange for an end to violence.

Mayhew told The Financial Times he wants to see a continuation of the 1991-92 talks process, which included all of Northern Ireland's major parties except Sinn Fein.

He said he would present those parties with his ideas on a new local parliament for Northern Ireland — an idea embraced by the province's pro-British, Protestant majority, less enthusiastically by John Hume's Social Democratic and Labor Party, which represents most Catholics.

Shuttle blasts off with Russian

First joint space mission in almost two decades

By MARCIA DUNN
Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Discovery rose with the sun and launched a new space age Thursday, carrying the first Russian into orbit aboard a U.S. shuttle.

The head of Russia's space program praised the prompt, and perfect, liftoff, considered a prelude to a shared space station and maybe, some day, a joint trip to Mars.

"We're going to change the way we look at space. We're going to do it together, instead of competing," said NASA Administrator Daniel Goldin.

Discovery blasted off at dawn, piercing a clear sky on its way to a 218-mile orbit. The rising sun gave the huge clouds of vapor left in the shuttle wake a pale orange glow.

Joining the five Americans on board for the eight-day science mission was cosmonaut Sergei Krikalev, who wore a Russian flag patch on the shoulder of his orange flight suit.

It's the first U.S.-Russian manned mission since the 1975 Apollo-Soyuz docking and the first time ever that astronauts and cosmonauts have been launched in the same spaceship.

In a statement from Moscow, Russian President Boris Yeltsin called the launch "a vivid manifestation of ever- growing cooperation and partnership between our countries and peoples."

"We are beginning to understand that we need to combine efforts to solve the complicated problems both on Earth and in space, for the benefit of our peoples and the entire world," Yeltsin said.

"It is remarkable that this launch has been on schedule, and everything is well, going all right," Russian space director Yuri Koptev told the shuttle launch team in Russian. "I hope that in our future cooperative projects, everything will be going as well, or right on schedule."

Koptev promised to return the favor early next year with a punctual Soyuz launch of a NASA astronaut to Russia's Mir space station.

Goldin later announced that astronaut will be Dr. Norman Thagard, with Bonnie Dunbar as his backup; they leave for Moscow in two weeks for a year of training. Dunbar's husband, astronaut Ronald Sega, coincidentally is aboard Discovery.

Atlantis is to make the first of up to 10 planned shuttle- Mir dockings in mid-1995, three months after Thagard's arrival at Mir. Thagard and the Mir cosmonauts will return to Earth aboard Atlantis, which will leave new cosmonauts in their stead.

Construction of a joint station is expected to start in 1997 and be completed in 2001. Once it's built and the U.S. and Russian economies improve enough, "It's on to Mars," Goldin promised.

Goldin said he's confident Russia's political and economic instability will not jeopardize the plans.

"Yes, there's turmoil in Russia," Goldin said. Nonetheless, "we had about 18 to 20 launches and Russia had 40 during the peak of their maximum turmoil."

Toxic fumes close UMass-Boston

BOSTON (AP) — University of Massachusetts officials submitted a plan Thursday outlining repairs and upgrades to ventilation systems on the campus where about 60 people have reported unexplained illnesses.

The campus, located in the city's Dorchester section, has been closed all week, while environmental consultants tried to find the source of fumes that made workers and students sick.

"We have been told on the basis of air monitoring tests that the overall results do not indicate airborne contaminants in concentrations that pose a risk to health and safety," said university spokesman Walter Littell.

The university plans to upgrade heating, ventilating and air conditioning units in the campus buildings, but the plans must be approved by the city Department of Health and Hospitals and the state Division of Occupational Hygiene.

"We hope that classes will begin on Monday," Littell said.

The first reports of dizziness, breathing problems and other ailments came last Wednesday, prompting a one-day shutdown of the campus. When more people fell ill on Friday, the university closed the campus and brought in a team of experts to figure out the problem.

Massachusetts, a consumer group, said the Senate bill would put a lid on rates and save money in the long term.

He noted that the insurance industry predicted rate cuts from previous reform plans, and the numbers "turned out to be totally wrong."

The estimates were based on analysis of how claims are paid under the current system, and how they would be paid under the new system. Finnegan said he has complete confidence in the numbers.

The auto insurance industry released a study to try to build opposition to the bill in the House. The study spelled out how rates would increase in each legislative district.

The Legislature's Insurance Committee is scheduled to take up the issue next week.

Adams comes to America

"This generation... is going to see peace in Ireland."

Gerry Adams arrived in the United States for 48 hours Tuesday to attend the National Committee on American Foreign Policy conference on northern Ireland's future.

The United States and Great Britain will tell you Adams is a terrorist. His voice is banned from British television and radio. He has been banned from the United States for almost two decades.

Adams is the leader of Sinn Fein, the political group pushing for a free, unified Ireland. His organization is a political one, "dangerous" because of their historical alliance and support of the Irish Republican Army (IRA).

Michael Morrissey

Like many in the North, Adams is part of the new breed of Irish who have tried to stop the senseless fighting and bring his country together. Unfortunately, his opponents have long memories.

Bill Clinton promised Irish–Americans Adams would receive a visa into the United States during the presidential campaign, only to renege on that promise for over a year. Adams was granted a 48 hour visa but he was ordered to stay within a 25–mile radius of his hotel and was not allowed to promote any of the numerous books he has written.

Nevertheless, he is making the effort for peace.

Adams' main critics, James Molyneaux and Ian Paisley, members of the Protestant Party, refused to attend the conference and blasted the Catholic Adams because of what they say is his reluctance to renounce violence in Northern Ireland.

As an Irish Protestant far removed from the European battlefield, i find it hard to believe that these men of a different religion will not sit down with Adams. By maintaining the war through newspapers, Paisley and Molyneaux are responsible for maintaining the war in the streets of Belfast.

John Major, the prime minister of Britain, is just as guilty. Instead of working with Adams, he denounces him for not breaking relations with the IRA. Major wants to see one small corner of a large picture, because of Britain's stake in the freedom of Northern Ireland.

Adams has denounced violence. He said he "wants to see the gun taken out of Irish politics. I want to see the IRA disbanded, I want to see the British Army removed." How much clearer can he get?

He wants the declaration signed by Ireland and Britain this past December clarified. Britain agreed to give up the North if the voters approved it. Adams is part of the Irish–Catholic minority which is in favor of the move, but the Protestant majority opposes it because they want their independence from Catholic Ireland.

This is a holy war, and Adams is one of the principals. He is trying to establish a legitimate foothold at a time when his critics are as vociferous as ever. He is urging Clinton, as the most powerful leader in the world to speak up and grease the peace process along. Willie won't.

Adams is trying to be recognized for what he is — a man caught in undesirable circumstances fighting for what he feels is right. He wants one ireland and suddeniy it seems to be within sight.

My grandfather (an Irish Catholic) and grandmother (a Methodist) made a decision when their children were born to bring them up Protestant. My father, and subsequently myself, did what people in the old country would see as unspeakable: he switched sides.

By marrying a Methodist and raising his children as Protestants, my grandfather's allegiances were broken up. He no longer spoke to his Catholic brothers and sisters in the city and forged a new life.

My distant relatives from generations ago were blind to the fact that the British and the Protestants and the IRA are all blind to now. They are blind to the fact that we are all people.

Peoples' religions can change. We can move from one homeland to another. We can change our minds and bury our hate. But we'll always be the same. A dead Catholic is worth no more than a dead Protestant, and vice versa.

Gerry Adams will always be seen as a murderer in the eyes of some. But in my eyes he will be seen as a man who has finally come to grips with the reality that unless the troubles stop, we will all be responsible for the continuing, senseless carnage.

Michael Morrissey is a Collegian columnist.

Everything can be relative

A friend once engaged me in what was supposed to be a relatively well–contested argument about something i didn't feel like paying attention to at the time.

He was a little dumbfounded when I replied, "It's all relative." He nodded his head in agreement. It's all he could do. After all, it's all relative.

Try it sometime. Next time your roommate insists that the Clinton administration has all but ignored the question of the death penalty and your cerebral cortex is entirely consumed by the antics of Screech on Saved by the Bell, all you need do is keep your focus affixed on Screech's wacky plaid shirt and say, "It's all relative."

"Yeah, I guess so," he'll say and realize that Screech's insanity really does take precedent at this time.

What else do you say? "No, no it's not all relative. You're wrong."

Now the intention here is not to imply there is a conversational be–all to end–all. That would be arrogant and defeating. But there's something charmingly amiss when such a simplistic remark can instantly dissolve a tete-a-tete.

Now the intention here is not to imply there is a conversational be–all to end–all. That would be arrogant and defeating. But there's something charmingly amiss when such a simplistic remark can instantly dissolve a tete-a-tete.

Adam Goulston

A dissection of the English language is something which should be reserved for a trained and verbose professor. The intent here is to venture into a discovery of an equally defeating remark which cannot be disputed, isn't worth arguing with and is just plain disrespectful.

Here's the scenario: you're reclining in your olive–green tweed 1a–Z–Boy delving into the pompous ravings of some acclaimed academic who your poli–sci instructor blatantly insisted you'll be quizzed on tomorrow. You need this grade.

Your apartment–mate Carlo stomps in deliberately, raving about the incompetence of the administrators at Whitmore who made him wait for two hours only to tell him the person he needed to talk to wasn't in today.

And while you'd love to join one of those ever–present Whitmore bashfests, you know that poli–sci quiz is getting all the more imposing and that entering this tempting tantrum would completely break your train of thought. It's time to quell the boy's anger.

"The bastards," he bellows. "I've gotta go back tomorrow to wait in a [expletive] line and talk to the same [expletive] people so I can be told to come back the next day. I pay their [expletive] salaries! And this is how they treat me?"

One reply is obvious: agree and join in and share one of your many less that gleeful Whitmore tales with Carlo. But this could go on for hours.

Another option we've discussed. We know "it's all relative" will hush the lad but couldn't another simple reply have the same effect? Let's see.

"And this is how they treat me?"

"Ah yes, but have you ever had sex with a heifer?"

That might work, but you'd probably have to explain yourself.

"...they are such [expletives]!"

"Let me tell you, that was some good cheese. I can still taste it."

While he thinks that one over, you could get on with your studies but soon he'd be inquiring about the cheese.

"They suck!"

"No, I suck!"

Unfortunately, you come up short with that reply and you know that never feels good.

It's all relative. It would be so very simple. The charm of such a reply is that it's in total agreement with whomever you're responding to. All the while, it's in complete lack of agreement. But by now, you've probably exhausted that one.

Maybe...

"They totally suck. Do you know what I mean?"

"Carlo, I think I love you."

Ahh, that's it. Maybe you do love him, as a friend. You just let him know that. But he may be having his doubts now about your sexual preference. Or he may be thinking you're just a bastard. Whatever the case, you've created a whirlwind of confusion in the boy's head which made him completely forget his Whitmore grudge. In the process, you made him look dumb. Love and relativity, that's the answer.

You can thank me later and I'd welcome any other ideas you have for a conversational spoiler. By the way, it was Gouda.

Spend money down here

NASA is the biggest waste of government spending. Does anybody really care about the weather on Neptune? There are more important things that our government can spend our tax dollars on.

Can you picture yourself telling some homeless people, "Oh, sorry, we decided to spend a billion dollars on finding out if Saturn's rings are really gaseous." Or can you picture yourself telling the starving nation of Ethiopia, "Hey, we didn't forget about you. It's just that there's this new volcano on Venus and we had to check it out. It only costs us a billion dollars."

We always hear people talk about how the "youth is the future of America." But, unfortunately, education is being neglected. Why should NASA bother gathering information if there aren't going to be any teachers to teach it or students to learn it?

David Chan

While the National Aeronautics and Space Administration launches billion–dollar satellites and rockets into space, there are millions of homeless Americans that are hoping to beg for enough money to buy a bag of chips for the day.

I'm from Boston and I'm sick of the neglect that homeless and hungry people are victims of. If any of you have been to Boston, you know what I'm talking about. How many people do you come across who ask for money just to get some food to eat? With the amount of taxes that we pay to the government, this situation should be taken care of.

What's more important to our government — human life or extraterrestrial life? Not only are there thousands of jobless Americans, millions of homeless people and millions of starving children, there are thousands dying of diseases everyday.

Can't the government spend more money on medical technology? How much longer does the world have to be haunted by cancer, heart diseases, and AIDS? Millions of people are suffering and dying because of them: three killers. I'm not saying that we should be able to find a cure overnight, but I think that it wouldn't hurt to put in a few more bucks for research. How about taking some money from the space program?

In addition to the necessity of spending more money on medical research, we are in need of health care reform. Because of the high unemployment rates, many Americans cannot afford health care. If medical technology were a priority, maybe operations and drugs would be less expensive. Does this sound logical? In America, suicide is illegal, but health care is unaffordable. Our government has to take better care of us.

And what about education? In terms of basic skills, Americans are falling behind other countries. I think this is embarrassing for a country that considers itself "number one" in the world. American education has suffered primarily because of financial cuts. How many jobs have been lost? How have resources suffered? Who isn't sick of tuition hikes?

Think about it — class sizes are getting bigger, resources aren't as good as they should be, and tuition is rapidly rising. It's a shame that some schools accept students because they are rich, not because of their academic ability.

Did you ever hear the saying, "Knowledge is power?" Well, according to today's standards, it's more like, "Money is power."

We always hear people talk about how the "youth is the future of America." But, unfortunately, education is being neglected. Why should NASA bother gathering information if there aren't going to be any teachers to teach It or students to learn it?

What's the use of expanding our space program if the average American is worse off than before? Granted, it was a tremendous achievement when we sent a man to the moon, but aren't we going a little too far now? My point is this: is it essential for us to sacrifice so much money on projects that are not useful for the average American?

Wouldn't it be great if we could all vote on how our tax dollars are spent? In other words, we decide how the money would be split between education, medicine, the homeless, NASA, military, etc. This may sound like a cliche, but as we all know, our government is supposed to serve its people.

Our government can do more for us, but it's not. Instead of going up to the stars and galaxies, we should come back down to Earth and just take a look around.

Letters to the Editor

Basic training is a 'necessary evil'

To the editor:

As a past, present and future member of the United States Air Force, I felt compelled to respond to Martin Brown's column "Military not for the innocent (Collegian, Feb. 2)."

Mr. Brown and i seem to have some common interests. We are both aspiring writers, both UMass students and, if his dates are correct, we both attended Air Force Basic Training at Lackland Air Force Base, Texas, at the same time – June, 1988. Despite these similarities, our viewpoints are vastly different.

Mr. Brown is correct when he tells you that there are many horrific aspects of basic training. What he fails to understand, however, are the reasons one must face such aspects to be successful in the military.

Many professions are dangerous and, as such, require a certain degree of fitness and discipline. Firefighters, law enforcement officers and bodyguards are just a few of the professions which are, along with the military, inherently dangerous. Standards have been created in these professions to ensure the safety of everyone involved. How many Corporate Executive Officer's or stock exchange employees routinely subject themselves to the risk of being killed or taken as a prisoner–of–war?

The men and women in today's military are often stereotyped unfairly. (By the way, I was a mechanic and hopefully will be a pilot!)

have not been brainwashed. I can assure you that we are not all robots who blankly take orders all day. We are encouraged to be creative and take steps towards improvement through concepts like our civilian counterparts' Total Quality Management initiatives.

You're correct, Mr. Brown, the military isn't for everyone. It's for people who welcome challenges and know a bit about self–sacrifice. As such, basic training becomes a "necessary evil."

The military is far from perfect, and I doubt anyone would dispute that. I respect your right to your opinion, and am sure you served your country proudly because you made a commitment and kept it. But please remember that you can express that opinion only because many men and women before you made the same commitment and are still keeping it today.

Military recruits are prepared, not hazed

To the editor:

This is in response to Martin Brown's column dated Feb. 2. In this column Mr. Brown stated that "he will never forget the day that he joined the United States Armed Forces." Well, neither will I.

The only difference between Mr. Brown and myself is that we went to two entirely different boot camps, on opposite sides of the spectrum. I went to the hardest boot camp in the Armed Forces, Parris Island Marine Corps Recruit Depot, South Carolina.

The scenario described by Mr. Brown could have come straight out of the movie Full Metal Jacket, a movie depicting the military during the height of the Vietnam war. While boot camp today is harsh, it is not hazing. It teaches you discipline, organization and the advantages of working together as a team — skills that will serve you well in the "real world."

In today's military there are so many rules and regulations regarding the treatment of recruits that it is almost impossible for a drill instructor to get away with hazing. Sure there is a lot of disciplining of recruits, such as physical exercise (pushups and sit–ups, etc.), but there is no physical abuse of recruits in today's military.

The hardest thing that recruits in today's military have to deal with is the "mind games" that all recruits face. But in today's world, no matter what the setting, we all have to deal with mind games.

Welcome back to the campus & valley music

Welcome back to a whole new semester of notes, ideas and commentary about the music scene both here in our hip and happy valley and other, much bigger and stranger places. To those of you who read this column and responded positively last semester, thank you. To new readers, read on and see what kind of musical thoughts we can dig from the recesses of our minds...

SOUNDS FROM THE VALLEY
Compiled by Brian Babineau & Matt Audette

Unfortunately, my writing partner last semester, Adam "Scope" Goulston, decided to take a brief hiatus from some of his Collegian duties. However, his spot will be filled by the capable writing stylings of Matt Audette, a first–rate music man down here.

Spring is an exciting and important time at UMass, for not only do we have the usual river of great live acts flowing into the valley, but our annual Spring Concert which looms ahead on May 8. (Contrary to rumors, the concert is definitely on this year . . .) Hopefully, the UPC will continue the great trends they set in the fall, pulling in Belly, Rage Against the Machine, etc, when they decide on the lineup for this year's party on the pond.

No discussion of outdoor concerts would be complete without noting that Lollapallooza 4 is in the planning stages. This columnist has heard an abundance of line–up rumors (they are only rumors, folks) ranging from Smashing Pumpkins to the Beastie Boys. While these bands are a good start, the organizers need to do something different to make it more than the ugly money–grubbing scene that it has been since the first year. Come on Perry Farrell, take control . . .

The big question in the world of rap seems to be: What happened to Ice Cube? After making three bona–fide hip hop classics, the once controversial rapper seems to be at a loss for ideas. Cube's newest release Lethal Injection lacks any of the fire that rapper once displayed on his earlier efforts.

Songs such as "Ghetto Bird" and "You Know How We Do It" come off sounding like sec-

Eroticism in church examined by artist

Michele Blondel's "Belly Button." REBECCA PETERSON/COLLEGIAN

By CHRISTINA ORWICZ

"Prelait–Point de Rosee–Lactaire Delicieux"
Michele Blondel
University Gallery

According to Betsy Siersma of the University Gallery, Michele Blondel's style is "very visceral, very physical; sometimes very dramatic, sometimes very light."

With this in mind it is not difficult to see how Blondel masters dichotomy, putting opposing sensations into forms, using brilliant and vivid colors to accentuate this dramatic and playful aspect of her work.

Having been raised in the France of the 1960s, Catholic– raised Blondel has been highly influenced by the church. More importantly, however, it is the eroticism that she felt in the Catholic church that shapes her work the most.

In working with Catholicism as a backdrop, she attempts to put the very basic, but not apparent, eroticism of the Catholic church into figure and forms. In one of the more accessible works, she has a set of photographs of her work being displayed in various churches and has it entitled "That Desire Carries Me Away."

Speaking on this matter, Siersma said that Blondel "likes the church," but that she also wishes to "challenge some of the things that exist in the church that we don't talk about."

It is not that Blondel wishes to denounce the church and it's attitudes towards sexuality. in fact, she has exhibited her work in many churches and has been well–received. She will also have an exhibit in a church in Boston

IMPORTANT MEDICAL DISCOVERY FOR FUTURE NURSES: AIR FORCE ROTC.

More and more nursing professionals have made an important medical discovery – opportunities are greatest through Air Force ROTC. A sampling of reasons given in recent Air Force nurse interviews: "... you can move up fast ..." And, the facilities are "... more advanced than I'd ever imagined." Plus, "... respect. You're treated like a professional."

Air Force ROTC represents a tremendous way to enter this environment. It prepares you to be a leader, a trained professional in the U.S. Air Force.

With Air Force ROTC, you may be eligible for a two- to three-year scholarship that pays your full college tuition and most textbooks, labs and other fees. And when you graduate, you're an Air Force officer, ready to make the most of your nursing career.

■ church

this April.

Two works which show how she wishes to challenge the church, or at least speak on some of the more complicated issues of the Catholic faith are "Well Hung" and "My Little Confession."

"Well Hung" is a work consisting of a set of mirrors in the shape of the cross, lying on the floor underneath a double- row of brightly colored vestments, which are suspended on dagger-like rods. Four glass penis and testicle shapes rest on the mirrors, producing what Siersma called a "looking up the skirt" effect. Siersma cited this work as Blondel's reference to the ritual of priests "proving manhood" before becoming a Pope, apparently adopted after Pope Joan, a woman, slipped by for years as a man.

Another work like this is the set of "confession boxes" the artist has done. Each box contains objects which would have belonged to someone, or simply objects which were symbols of their sins. Some of these objects take on comforting proportions: old gloves, photographs, and breast-like sculptures.

Characteristic of her work, these boxes are dichotomous; the doors of the boxes are guillotine-like, thereby setting up a juxtaposition between comfort, the absolution received after confession, and the threat of decapitation and death.

It is precisely these paradoxes which make Blondel's work so special and appealing. She handles opposing ideas gracefully, turning linear figures into rounded ones, as in "Always Go Straight" or having steel cages and spikes encase fragile glass balls, as in "Stay Away from My Balls."

The most profound way in which these sets of paradoxes function is in the phallic and breast-like sculptures she uses prolifically.

Those unfamiliar with the Catholic church may have a difficult time understanding the innate eroticism Blondel feels about her faith. But is it clear that she has tapped into her gut feelings about this part of her culture, and managed to reproduce them in color, shifting forms, and opposition.

Now that 1993 has come to an end and the obligatory barrage of "best of" and "worst of" lists have become a distant memory, let's look back at a few of the uncovered gems that may have been looked over.

St. Louis's Uncle Tupelo released their major-label debut Anodyne this fall, firmly securing their spot as "the world's coolest country band" (that is quite a compliment coming from someone who loathes country music). The album jerks back and forth between delicate country-esque ballads, to full blown noise rave-ups that vaguely recall the late Graham Parsons. With a song also on the mega-hyped AIDS benefit compilation No Alternative, this may be one band to watch out for.

Underground sensations and critics darlings American Music Club returned in '93 with Mercury, another brilliant album, crammed with songs about lost love, unhappiness, and just being an average everyday loser. Lead singer Mark Eitzel croons his confessional lyrics with such honesty and emotion he makes Morrissey look like Mr. Rogers. Although critics have been waiting for the band to break it big since the late eighties, they have been shamefully overlooked by radio and MTV. Maybe now that they have the backing of a major label they will get the recognition they deserve. Look out, Alternative Nation.

Your Horoscope

By Joann Dizon

ARIES (March 21-April 19): An influential person will go out of their way to help you. Scrutinize bills carefully; you may have been overcharged. Some personal advice will be right on target. Romance heats up.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Your financial situation brightens thanks to careful planning. A friend may lax your patience; do not rush things. VIPs will reward your decisiveness in the near future. Be prepared for surprises.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Try to free yourself from lingering doubts. Stay abreast of the times. Do your homework diligently, others cannot fault you if your facts are in order. A good evening to socialize. Seek introductions.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): The sale of stocks or real estate will help your finances. Be willing to go that extra mile for your loved ones. An office romance could be dangerous, protect your good name.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Good news arrives today. Do not minimize an upcoming business or career opportunity. Your partner is your strongest ally but may not always show it. Become a better listener.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Go along with your co- workers' ideas when they make sense. Candid communication sheds new light on a changing situation. A confused child will respond to TLC. Show your tender, protective side.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Good luck comes through who you know. A heart-to-heart talk with your mate leads to deeper rapport. A secret fear is unfounded. Let yourself relax when attending a party tonight!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Try to trim expenses without taking all the fun out of life. Put those credit cards away and pay cash. An artistic success is right around the corner. Bask in the applause.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A quarrel with a sibling could upset your equilibrium. Own up to your mistakes. Sign contracts or agreements with confidence. Strengthening old associations will lead to new rewards. Bank any extra funds.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Major decisions are easier to reach now. Eliminate the dead wood from your social life. Reject those invitations that do not interest you. A new friend becomes a confidant. Your support is invited.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A secret benefactor or admirer could lend unexpected help behind-the-scenes support, use it wisely. Finish pending projects before launching new ones. Meditation brings peace of mind tonight.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Sharing vital information about a new trend could advance your career. Trust your instincts when promoting an unusual idea or product. Take a chance on an intriguing new lover.

Cal's cardiac kids stun FSU

ABAM COMERAN / COLLEGIAN

Minuteman guard Edgar Padilla, surrounded by Florida St. guard Charlie Ward and forward Bob Sura, puts up a shot during last night's 62–58 win over the Seminoles.

By ARTHUR STAPLETON JR.
Collegian Staff

They say home is where your heart is. For No. 11 Massachusetts, the William D. Mullins Center has been the place where the Minutemen stop the hearts of 9,493 fans, especially in last night's 62–58 heart–stopping victory over Atlantic Coast Conference member Florida State.

Massachusetts remained undefeated on its home parquet which was unveiled exactly one year ago today, 13–0.

Massachusetts' defense in the final 10 minutes keyed the Minutemen, while sophomore Donta Bright took care of the offense in a stretch when Coach John Calipari's squad outscored the Seminoles, 15–3. Bright finished with seven rebounds and 10 points, four in the final run.

The Seminoles drop to 9–8, while the Minutemen push their record to 17–3. Massachusetts made it the fifth time this season it came back to beat a team after trailing in the second half.

"At one time, I looked out and I saw two freshmen, two sophomores and Derek [Kellogg, a junior]. That was our team. I'm like, 'Oh, my god, this is getting scary'," said Calipari. "It was a great win. I still don't know how we won the game, to be honest with you, but it's nice to win."

Massachusetts' final run began after Bright made one of two free throws to pull the Minutemen within seven, 55–47, with 8:19 left to go in the contest. FSU attempted to get into its halfcourt offense the next trip down, but couldn't.

"We didn't score, and I believe they went on a 15–3 run. They just turned their defense up," said Florida State Coach Pat Kennedy.

Seminole point guard Charlie Ward (10 points, 11 rebounds, four assists and three steals) was forced into a desperation top–of–the–key trey from 22 feet out with the shot–clock running down and Massachusetts forward Dana Dingle (nine points, nine rebounds, six offensive) corraled the long rebound in front of Kennedy and the Seminole bench.

Kennedy called to the referees for a travel on Dingle but didn't get it. Massachusetts took advantage — Dingle fired a pass up court to junior guard Derek Kellogg, who found Bright slashing to the foul line. Bright swooped in the lane and banked in a 15–footer, drawing the foul on FSU guard James Collins in the process. The sophomore from Baltimore, Md., completed the three–point play, pulling the Minutemen within four, 55–51, but more importantly swung the momentum toward the home team.

After a time out, the Seminoles gave the ball back to Massachusetts when Bright harassed FSU sophomore Jonathan Kerner, knocking it off the center's leg out–of– bounds. Marcus Camby (11 points, five rebounds and four blocks) and Massachusetts capitalized once again, as the freshman center took a pass from junior co–captain Lou Roe and laid it home, cutting the Seminole lead to two, 55–53.

FSU's Chuck Graham, the game's leading scorer with 20 points, made one of two at the charity stripe to push the lead back to three. With 5:51 to go, Camby put back the rebound off of a Kellogg–missed free throw to start the final run for the Minutemen, who trailed 56–55.

The Massachusetts defense did the rest. Bright was in the face of Seminole guard Bob Sura (18 points, nine rebounds) for the rest of the contest, forcing Ward on the next series into taking a fall–away three–pointer; he missed and Roe hit a spinner in the lane to give the Minutemen their first lead since 30–29 with 1:28 left in the first half.

FSU's only field goal in the final 10 minutes came on Sura's only bucket in the same span off a weak–side rebound, giving the Seminoles their final lead, 58–57. Massachusetts would score the final five points en route to the win which gave them a 3–0 record versus the ACC this season (the Minutemen defeated North Carolina, 91–86, and Maryland, 94–80).

"The game was never over until there were double zeroes on the clock," said Ward. "We've made a big improvement. From getting blown out on the road and at home, to winning on the road and playing tough on the road. We might just make a run here late."

Massachusetts travels to New Jersey for a non–conference battle with Kentucky at the Meadowlands on Sunday, while Florida State hosts Virginia in Tallahassee.

PLAYER OF THE GAME

DONTA BRIGHT
MASSACHUSETTS

Bright was the spark that ignited the Minutemen in the final ten minutes of the second half, both offensively and defensively. The 6–foot–6 sophomore from Baltimore, Md., converted a huge three–point play with 7:37 left that gave Massachusetts all of the momentum, gave the capacity crowd in the Mullins Center something to cheer about and gave Florida State a sign of things to come.

WHY MASSACHUSETTS WON THE GAME

Massachuseits fought and clawed in the final ten minutes, using every ounce of determination it could muster to catch the Seminoles. The pressure defense didn't have an effect an FSU point man Charlie Ward, but the Minuteman D on the rest of the team did. Ward was forced to take some desperation shots which Massachusetts turned into paints an the other end.

If you believe in destiny, then the Minutemen were going to win. Massachusetts is undefeated (13–0) in the Mullins Center, ever since it opened exactly one year ago today (Feb. 4, 1993). Heading into Sunday's contest with Rick Pitino's Kentucky Wildcats at the Meadowlands Arena in New Jersey, John Calipari said he still hopes his team can play 40 minutes of basketball each time out for the rest of the season; if they don't, according to Bright, they'll get beat by 50 points.

Say What?

"We shoot it straight.
It just doesn't go in."

Two rematches for hockey

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

MATT RAINNO/COLLEGIAN

Defenseman Brian Corcoran and the UMass hockey team head to Villanova tonight before their Sunday rematch at home against Merrimac College.

With the hot glare of the spotlight focused on the University of Massachusetts hockey team's rematch with Merrimack Sunday, it is easy to overlook the other rematch the team has — tonight at Villanova.

The Wildcats give Massachusetts (16–7) its best opportunity to secure a victory this weekend, with the team struggling along at an 8–9 pace and a 4–4 mark in ECAC South.

Forward Christopher Paquette leads the team in points with 26 (11 goals, 15 assists) and Ryan Stattenfield, who scored Villanova's only goal in the team's 9–1 loss in Amherst Oct. 30, has 17 points. Kyle Cappallo leads the team with 13 goals.

"I think with Villanova you've gotta go right at them," said UMass Coach Joe Mallen. "We have got to stay focused with the task at hand, we can't even think about Merrimack until after the Villanova game."

Merrimack has been circled on the calendar since the Warriors handed the Minutemen their lunch in an 8–2 loss at Volpe Rink in Andover Oct. 24. UMass hung into their first game of the season until the Warriors had a four–goal flurry in the first three minutes of the second period.

Rob Atkinson and Cooper Naylor lead the team with 34 and 32 points, respectively. Atkinson's 14 goals are tops with Merrimack, and Matt Adams is tied for second with 11 goals.

UMass was unable to solve goaltender Martin Legault in the two team's first meeting. Legault, who sports an 8–13–2 record and a 3.80 goals against average, will probably get the start. He was named Hockey East Co–Rookie of the Week. Eric Thebeault may spell Legault or start in his place.

The goaltending situation is up in the air for UMass. Two weeks ago, Dave Kilduff would probably have started against the Warriors. But the play of Rich Moriarty in the UMass upset of Division I Army makes the decision more difficult.

Mallen has said he will not decide until after the Villanova game. One option for the team, especially if tonight's game is a blowout, is to alternate Kilduff and Moriarty and see which one comes up bigger.

Bright steals Ward's show

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

Originally this story was going to be devoted to Florida State's point guard/Heisman Trophy winning quarterback Charlie Ward. After all, Ward directed the Seminole offense flawlessly for 30 + minutes and he and his FSU teammates were poised to end Massachusetts' unbeaten streak at the William D. Mullins Center. But then the story changed.

The Minutemen dug in and held FSU to one field goal in the last 9:59, winning the game with defense and emotion yet again.

No one more exemplified those qualities for Massachusetts than sophomore forward Donta Bright. The usually soft– spoken and laid–back Bright spoke loud and clear in the second half.

Bright's speech began when he spun into the lane and somehow banked in a shot while being fouled by FSU's James Collins. Bright's subsequent free throw brought the Minutemen to within four at 55–51 with 7:37 to go in the game. But more importantly, he brought the crowd back in the game.

Waving his hands in the air, Bright was trying to spur the now–deafening Mullins Crowd to greater heights. Not surprisingly, they responded and so did his teammates.

While the late surge by the Minutemen to steal the game away from FSU could be called characteristic, Bright's theatrics could be called anything but that. In addition to his crowd–inducing waves, Bright yelled at and jawed with FSU's dangerous swingman Bobby Sura during the stretch run. According to Bright, it was all for a reason.

"Well, I was just trying to psyche myself up and play good defense," Bright said.

Obviously it worked, because Sura, who scored 16 points in the game's first 25 minutes, was held to a single layup in the final 15, mainly with Bright right in his mug.

So the Minutemen, who appear to be worse for your heart than bacon at every single breakfast, somehow found a way to win yet again. "This [Massachusetts] is a team that doesn't go away, and I have got to give them credit for that," said Massachusetts Coach John Calipari.

"They're an interesting team because I think they find ways to win," said FSU Coach Pat Kennedy.

The Seminoles, meanwhile, fell in a game they could have, or maybe should have won, but were optimistic despite the outcome.

"With Charlie (Ward) back, we've improved 100 percent," said Kennedy.

"I'm very excited about the opportunity we had and to come in play the way we did," said Ward.

Ward, a celebrity because of his ability on the gridiron, also showed that he contained a considerable amount of talent on the basketball court.

"He's probably one of the best athletes we've played against all year, and will play against (all year)," said UMass point guard Derek Kellogg.

Because of his football notoriety, the Mullins Center crowd was all over him with chants of "Charlie! Charlie!" as soon as he stepped on the court for warmups. Ward simply smiled in return. And for good reason.

"It really doesn't bother me, I'm the type of guy who likes challenges," said Ward.

Unfortunately for Ward and his FSU teammates, the Minutemen apparently do too. Just ask Donta Bright.

Double-Duty Johnson leads track team to URI

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts sports fans are faced Sunday with the sort of dilemma most diehards only dream of — either they may watch the men's basketball team duel with Kentucky at the Meadowlands on ABC, or they may file into the Mullins Center and enjoy the hockey team's pursuit of its first victory atop a Hockey East team, the Merrimack Warriors.

But would you believe there's a third option? Actually, there isn't, but it would be nice if everyone had the chance to see the men's track team (10–6) meet at the University of Rhode Island, which won the consolation bracket of the New England Challenge Cup finals on Jan. 21, outscoring UMass 88–46.

Also competing Sunday are the University of New Hampshire, Hartford and Central Connecticut State, all of which UMass dominated in the meet at UNH last Saturday.

In that meet, Coach Ken O'Brien's squad proved it is deep and dangerous. The Minutemen were winners in seven events and finished second in two more. But O'Brien said he knows URI's strength is in the sprints, where UMass has not cashed in many top places.

"It may come down to who can steal a few points from the opponent's strength," O'Brien said. "We need to make up more than 40 points since two weeks ago, and that's a lot."

O'Brien's team does hold the upper hand in distance and jumping events, and he hopes his team can make the difference count.

"If we can score a few more points in the jumping events and find ourselves picking up points in the throwing events, we can win," O'Brien said.

For strength in the jumping department, O'Brien needs to look no further than to football tailback John Johnson. Tailback? Yes, in addition to the 899 yards the senior rushed for in 1993 while wearing a UMass football jersey, last Saturday he turned in the best long jump by a UMass team member this season: 21 feet, 9 and three–quarters inches.

Indicative of this squad's balance is its depth that lies in all classes. Seniors Johnson and Paul Doyle, a hurdler, provide the necessary leadership, but freshmen such as Terry O'Neill, Todd Lewis, and Gregory

NBA starts to tighten up

Anthony Guido's Notes from the Hardwood

As we approach the NBA All–Star Game we have probably the most wide open season in recent memory. Defense now rules the NBA and as many as 10 teams have a legitimate shot at winning it all.

Looking at the All–Star Game, how surprising is it that two of the Eastern Conference's starting five are from the New Jersey Nets? Actually, not very. Derrick Coleman and Kenny Anderson are destined to be the John Stockton and Karl Malone of the East.

D.C. is holding up the Nets for $90 million, perhaps more than the franchise is worth. Unfortunately, the Nets have no choice but to sign him as no NBA team has enough talent to trade for the moody superstar.

On the note of trades, expect a lot of teams to wheel and deal with this race so wide open. The Los Angeles Clippers and Detroit Pistons (now truly the —–bad boys) are teams that have fallen apart. Here are two trades which help everyone involved:

1) Scottie Pippen has been placing pressure on General Manager Jerry Krause to keep up with the Knicks and make a deal. The Bulls send forwards Horace Grant, Scott Williams, and a number one draft pick to the Clippers for forward Danny Manning. Manning will leave Los Angeles anyway. Both teams can give new huge contracts to their respective stars.

2) The Pistons send guard Joe Dumars to the Denver Nuggets for forward Rodney Rogers and guard Bryant Stith. Rogers is blocked in Denver behind LaPhonso Ellis. The unselfish Dumars makes Denver a playoff team now.

How bad are the Celtics?

I love to be able to write that. Finally the dynasty is over, the team is headed to the lottery and Boston cannot trade their way out of this misery. With eyes for the future, I wouldn't even swap the Dallas Mavericks roster for this Celtics team.

Right now Seattle is going through a bit of a mid–season slump. View it as a changing of the team leadership, look for Detlef Schrempf to become the go–to man; Shawn Kemp doesn't want to take the big shots.

If Houston or San Antonio can land another guard they can challenge Seattle on the strength of their dominant centers. The Rockets need an outside shooter like Ron Harper or Jeff Hornacek but have little to trade.

The same holds true for the Spurs, who need a quality point guard badly. Trouble is, you can't land a Scott Skiles with J.R. Reid and Lloyd Daniels as bait.

What's the injury of the week for Alonzo Mourning? Last week he got kicked in the calf muscle.

I like the NBA a lot more with Michael Jordan gone. Doesn't everyone?

Shelling kills 68 in Sarajevo

By TONY SMITH
Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Bosnia– Herzegovina — U.N. Secretary– General Boutros Boutros–Ghali asked NATO on Sunday to approve air strikes on mortar positions around Sarajevo, one day after the deadliest attack on the city in the 22–month siege by Bosnian Serbs.

The death toll from Saturday's shelling of a busy marketplace rose to 68, while three U.S. cargo planes arrived to evacuate victims of the massacre. The Bosnian government declared a day of mourning, and residents railed at a world they say should be stopping the fighting rather than mopping up after it.

A senior U.N. official in New York, speaking on a condition of anonymity, said Boutros–Ghali sent a letter Sunday night to NATO Secretary General Manfred Woerner asking him to seek authorization from NATO members for air strikes.

The strikes would be targeted "against artillery or mortar positions in or around Sarajevo which are responsible for attacks on civilian targets," the official said.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization voted in August to provide air strikes on Serb troops ringing Sarajevo if the United Nations requested them. NATO leaders toughened their stance at a summit last month, but had been waiting for Boutros–Ghali's request.

There was no immediate word on when the NATO council would meet.

NATO sources in Brussels, Belgium, speaking on a condition of anonymity, said Sunday it was unlikely NATO would turn down a request from Boutros–Ghali's to approve air strikes. They were commenting before Boutros–Ghali's request was made public.

The 16–member alliance demonstrated it was not in full agreement about the increased involvement in Bosnia's war, which has killed more than 200,000 Muslims, Serbs and Croats.

Some nations, notably Britain and Canada, have been reluctant to call in planes for fear of spreading the war and of reprisals against their troops serving with the U.N. aid operator in Bosnia.

U.S. Defense Secretary William Perry backed away from the threat of U.S. air strikes, calling instead for a negotiated settlement.

Territories returning to notions of war

By NEIL MacFARQUHAR

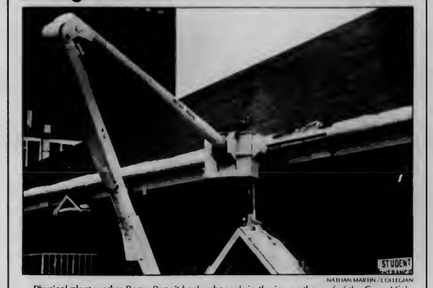
JERUSALEM — Palestinians were jubilant at the prospect of better lives when moves toward self–rule were announced. Not quite five months later, they're again eager to attack Israeli targets and challenge PLO leader Yasser Arafat.

The bitter mood in the Israeli–occupied territories turned blacker Sunday when bickering between Israeli politicians and top generals threatened further delays in achieving Palestinian autonomy.

"Peace is not a theory, it's something that ordinary people need to touch," said Raji Sourani, a lawyer who heads the Gaza Center for Rights and Law.

There have been some changes since the accord between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization was signed in Washington on Sept. 13, 1993.

Palestinians could openly raise their flag, an act that used to draw Israeli gunfire. Over 700 Palestinians have been released from Israeli jails and a few streets sealed with barrels to prevent stone–throwing have been opened.



But under the original plan, the Israeli army was to start withdrawing from the Gaza Strip and the West Bank area around Jericho on Dec. 13 and finish withdrawing by April 13. Palestinians were to police the streets and civilian authorities were to assume responsibility for taxation, housing and utilities.

There are no deadlines now.

Instead, the process is in Israeli

Rumors and doubts plague food services

By VANESSA AMIN
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note:This is the first in a two–part series concerning the residential dining commons.

Thousands of hungry Southwest residences wait in line in the dining commons hoping for a well balanced meal but are always wondering what exactly is in the food they are about to eat.

A look at the Dining Commons

Since rumors are spreading fast, students are starting to have health concerns regarding Hampshire, Berkshire and Hampden Dining Commons' food services for Southwest Residences.

The rumors that are flooding students' minds are about the quality of the food and if the food is healthy for the students.

According to Leslie Weinstock, a senior psychology major, she heard that the quality of the food is very low and that there were sightings of roaches.

"I heard that the dining commons uses low grade eggs as well as low quality meat," Weinstock said.

According to Joyce Fredrick, R.D., the dietitian for the University Food Service Department, students need to stop listening to rumors and learn how to be creative with their meals. The food that is served is top quality and healthy, however it is up to the students what choices they make, Fredrick said.

"The students' health is my top priority. I would never serve anything less that the best," Fredrick said.

With so many students, one can't stop rumors from starting, Fredrick said. There are rumors that the food that is being served is imitation, however the labels that are used one would see in a grocery store, such as Campbell's Soup and Tyson Chicken, Fredrick said.

Eric Witkop, a first year student with an undeclared major, heard from a friend that an excess amount of starch is put into the food so the students will be too full for seconds.

According to Fredrick, nothing is added to the food. Pasta does have a lot of starch but not any more than what one would eat at home, Freckick said.

Fredrick writes the menu for all the dining halls at the university. She also orders the food which is only "the best," Fredrick said. The students are not just paying for food but for labor, maintenance and the workers' wages. She is dealing with hard–earned student money, that is why she tries to buy the best, Fredrick said.

The University has its own central cold/dry warehouse where all the food is stored after ordering. When ordering food, Fredrick tries to order food with less amounts

UM graduate brings relief to Northridge

By GERI SAHN
Collegian Staff

After the devastating earthquake in California occurred, many people began donating money and giving help to those who were affected by the destruction.

Of the many donators, University of Massachusetts graduate, Eva Pieper, now Eva Kokosinska, has been working hard in raising money for residents of the Northridge Meadows Apartments in Calif.

Pieper is the resident manager for the 112 unit Northridge apartments in Northville, Mich. She originally decided to help the people in the apartments in California because the complexes share the same name.

"The fund–raising originally began when the owner of the apartments in Michigan made a donation. I then began researching where to give money as well," Pieper said.

She first set out with a goal of $10,000. Pieper said she did a great deal of networking in order to collect money and pledges.

"I have a friend in the print shop who helped me send out flyers to spread out what we were trying to accomplish. I also called my sister in Massachusetts," she said.

Pieper has also asked her sorority house, Iota Gamma Upsilon at UMass, to help receive donations as well. So far, IGU has asked for contributions and has received publicity in the Daily Hampshire Gazette. This week they will be putting up flyers asking for money. The flyer were donated by Kinko's Copies.

Pieper also owns a salon for hair and nails. She received many donations from her staff and was able to do a large amount of publicity work through there.

"I have received many letters from the people who lived in the apartment complex. They need desperate help. You have to go beyond what you see on television. In the aftermath, the destruction is bad. Some people have lost everything they have," Pieper said.

Pieper said she received a little over $3,000 including pledges of donations so far. Pledges have come from major companies.

"People have donated amounts from a $10 check to a $100 check. Companies have pledged from $100 to $250," she said.

This weekend, two major events are taking place in order to receive more donations. On Feb. 11, an event will be held at Legends, a night club in Detroit.

On Feb. 11 and 12, Tremors, a night club which is part of the Holiday Inn, will also be holding a benefit in order to raise money. They will be having a buffet, games and autographed books to buy. All of the proceeds will go to the the fund–raiser. The mayor and governor of Detroit may also be present.

"Everything in these two events is donated. Nothing is being paid for. Budweiser beer is donating 15 cases and is selling the beer for lower prices," she said.

Buck passed back to USOC for final word on champ

By STEPHEN WILSON

LILLEHAMMER, Norway — The Tonya Harding affair is still an American matter, in the eyes of the IOC.

Harding's spot in the Lillehammer Games was discussed for the first time Sunday by the International Olympic Committee, which promptly turned it back to the U.S. Olympic Committee.

"The executive board wishes to express its full support for the U.S. Olympic Committee and is confident that the USOC will take the wisest decision in this matter, taking into account all circumstances," IOC director general Francois Carrard said.

He said the executive board unanimously agreed that the issue "is in the hands of the USOC at this stage."

He said the IOC has the final word on acceptance of entries for the Games, meaning it has the authority to bar an athlete. But he said Harding could not appeal to the IOC if she is banned by the USOC.

"Under the Olympic Charter, all national Olympic committees have the right to enter their athletes," Carrard said. "If they don't enter someone, there's no issue. We could only step in when an athlete has been entered."

Other IOC officials have said it is unlikely they would overrule the USOC if it clears Harding to compete.

"It would be very difficult for the IOC to say to the

On–ice and off–ice battle could make or break games

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. — Tonya Harding vs. Nancy Kerrigan on the ice in Norway.

If it comes off, it will undoubtedly be one of the most dramatic confrontations in Olympic history. And perhaps one of the highest–rated TV shows ever.

If it doesn't, the glamour event of the Winter Games will lose much of its sizzle.

Right now, it's still on, even though a U.S. Figure Skating Association panel called for a disciplinary hearing against Harding. The panel said Saturday that it found "reasonable grounds" to believe she was involved in the attack on Kerrigan at the national championships in Detroit a month ago.

Rather than boot Harding from the Olympic team, the association passed the decision on the USOC along with a "black book" containing nearly 400 pages of affidavits, court documents and other evidence gathered independently by the panel.

Virtually all of that information is in the hands of prosecutors in Portland, Ore., who have not charged Harding in a plot that has already brought a guilty plea by her ex– husband Jeff Gillooly and confessions by three other men.

Harding met for more than two hours Sunday with her lawyer but neither had any comment on the meeting.

Claire Ferguson, president of the USFSA, carefully followed the rules of the association in not suspend-

U.S. must focus on Japan

As the Clinton Administration enters its sophomore year, foreign policy has bullied its way to the top of the agenda. In the United States, we — and Bill Clinton himself — would most certainly prefer to concentrate our government's efforts on the major domestic problems of the day, like health care, poverty, crime and homelessness. But the world has determined that our country is a superpower, and in that not-always-desirable role, sometimes the entire planet's security ends up being set around the long tables of the secret meeting rooms in Washington.

And when the highly capable William J. Perry succeeds the mediocre Les Aspin as Secretary of Defense, he will be faced with a world stage that is not as tidy as it was a year ago, and not nearly as clear-cut as it was a decade ago. The threats to world security reach beyond Bosnia and Somalia now. They reach into Algeria and Egypt, where radical groups threaten the governments, into an ambitious Syria and a turbulent Israel, into right-wing insurgencies in Germany and England, into conflict in Occupied Ireland.

But Perry will find a far greater threat in Asia and Eastern Europe, where Russia threatens to explode into revolt or thrust itself across Ukraine's border, and where a war — conventional or something worse — between North Korea, South Korea and the United States is currently rated as Perry's top concern. And one still greater threat awaits William Perry's discovery:

Japan will soon be a nuclear power with imperial ambitions.

Ichiro Ozawa is the head of Japan's political reform movement. But Ozawa is now being discovered for what he is — an ambitious poseur backed by Japan's ruling families. For centuries, the same few families have manipulated the power structure in Japan. Since the end of World War II, these families have hand-picked prime ministers. And when public dissatisfaction with one-party rule reached a crisis level, these secret rulers started up a phony reform movement that purported to challenge the political old guard without shifting any real power.

Ozawa has confused many by saying that Japan should build its own defenses, while at the same time stating that this does not mean Japan should become a military power.

Peter J. Orvetti

When Bill Clinton became the American president, the ruling families feared for Japan's economic security. Clinton was not likely to befriend Japan in the manner that his predecessors did. So the famillies manipulated Japan's economy into a downturn. With the American media reporting a massive recession in Japan and the fall of the government to reformers, Japan looked far less threatening and Clinton began to back off. When the coast is clear, the ruling families will simply flip the switch to start the Japanese economy going again.

So what about Ozawa? He has been hard at work behind the scenes to strengthen Japan's military. He has confused many by saying that Japan should build its own defenses, while at the same time stating that this does not mean Japan should become a military power. Japan's military spending is now third in the world — behind only the U.S. and Russia. In addition, and in defiance of its post-World War II constitution, Japan has purchased massive amounts of weapons-grade plutonium.

When the United States attacked Iraq in 1991, most of the weapons components used came from Japan. Now Japan is going to apply this technology to Its own advantage. And when the "recession" ends, and Japan — still with strong memories of its wide-reaching 1930s empire — starts talking aggressively like it did during the Bush years, the threat will return.

Except this time, they'll have a nuclear bomb with which to back it up.

Peter J. Orvetti is a student at Hampshire College.

Change policy on Bosnia

Christopher Hitchins, the award-winning British journalist, recently called Bosnia-Herzegovina the third genocide we've witnessed this century. He cited the Turkish genocide in Armenia and the Holocaust as the first two. According to Hitchins, the main difference between Bosnia-Herzegovina and the other two is that we know far more of the details of the genocide in Bosnia-Herzegovina as it is happening. Yet, after two full years of atrocities, the U.S. government continues to do nothing.

Serbia inherited all the weaponry and weapons plants of the former Yugoslav Army while Bosnia-Herzegovina inherited nothing, and still we insist on upholding this disastrous arms embargo.

Thomas Z. Bales

The infamous murder of Kitty Genovese happened in New York in 1964. The Los Angeles Times wrote, "Screaming for help, she was stabbed repeatedly and killed in front of her New York apartment, and not one of the 38 neighbors who heard her, including those who came to their windows to watch, even called for help." Bosnia-Herzegovina is an International Kitty Genovese.

Here in the United States we sit and watch the Serbs carry out a horrific campaign of genocide on the people of Bosnia-Herzegovina. We not only hear, we watch, we see the pictures every day — on the news, in the newspapers. Because we know what is happening, we have a responsibility to act, just as Kitty Genovese's neighbors did.

Many UMass students have seen Schindler's List by now. This is the story of how one man made a difference during World War II. He risked his life to save 1,100 Jews. Steven Spielberg saw the parallels between the Holocaust and the genocide in Bosnia-Herzegovina. In speaking of his film he said, "I could have made [Schindler's List] next year, ... but what was happening in Bosnia was so familiar and it was so much part of what I thought could never happen again. I just felt like sooner rather than later, a movie like this should come out."

Eli Wiesel, the Nobel laureate and Holocaust survivor, also saw the parallels between Bosnia-Herzegovina and the Holocaust. At the opening of the U.S. Holocaust Museum he told Pres. Clinton, "I have been in the former Yugoslavia last fall. I cannot sleep since what I have seen. As a Jew I am saying that. We must do something to stop the bloodshed in that country... Something, anything, must be done."

It is time for our country to act. This is not ancient ethnic feuding, as our government tells us. The most bitter feud in the former-Yugoslavia is between the Serbs and the Croats, and today they are cooperating in wiping out the largely- Muslim Bosnians.

Our government must first get the United Nations to lift the arms embargo. The United States government set up the people of Bosnia-Herzegovina when we first recognized Bosnia-Herzegovina as an independent nation and then denied them the right to defend themselves. Serbia inherited all the weaponry and weapons plants of the former Yugoslav Army while Bosnia-Herzegovina inherited nothing, and still we insist on upholding this disastrous arms embargo.

We must open the Tuzla airport so medical supplies and other humanitarian aid can get in. As Michael Curtis wrote in the Boston Globe, "It is time for the Western leaders to inform the Bosnian Serbs that the airport will be opening without asking the Serbs for permission."

Most importantly, it is time to break the siege of Sarajevo, a multicultural city where, to this day, Muslims, Christians and Jews continue to live in relative harmony. On this point, our government needs to consider air strikes on the artillery posts surrounding Sarajevo. Last August, when the Serbs believed air strikes might come, they withdrew from Mt. Igman. Today they are back on that mountain shelling the city of Sarajevo.

Each student at UMass can make a difference. Whether you believe the solution is to increase humanitarian aid, to open the Tuzla airport, to consider air strikes, or all of these, now is the time to act. We need to write letters to our president and to our senators.

Tonight at 7 p.m. in Campus Center 165-169, Hillel along with Friends of Bosnia, the Muslim Student Association, the United Christian Foundation, the Ark and the Newman Center will present "BosniAid: An Evening of Hope for Bosnia." At this event will be two powerful speakers: David Wyman, author of Abandonment of the Jews, and Michael Curtis, a physician who just returned from Tuzla with the group Doctors Without Borders. There will also be a short video, letter writing and information on what else you can do.

Whatever you think the solution is, BosniAid is an outstanding opportunity to begin your actions.

Letters to the Editor

Barriers to voting lowered by new law

To the editor:

I read with great interest Andrew Davidson's Jan. 28 column ("Voting is the key to change") urging all citizens to become active voters. As Senate chairman of the Legislature's Committee on Election Laws, I share his concern about elected officials listening only to those constituents who wield the power of the ballot box.

I am, therefore, pleased to report that on Jan. 14 the governor signed into law a bill written by the Election Laws Committee that encourages greater voter participation in local, state and national elections. With the stroke of a pen, Massachusetts sheds the dubious distinction of being one of the 13 most restrictive states for voter registration. Now it is up to the citizens of the Commonwealth to accept the responsibility of living in a state with one of the easiest, most convenient registration systems.

The impact of the so-called "motor voter" law will be felt almost immediately. Only July 1 of this year, citizens may begin registering to vote by mail. The remaining provisions of the law — allowing registration at Registry of Motor Vehicle offices and other state agencies, and making registration forms available at all state colleges and universities, to name only two — will take effect next January. Trips to the town or city clerk's office between 9-5 on weekdays will no longer be required.

These are just some of the instant reforms contained in the law. But what may be more important is the long-term promise this law holds for our state government and our state's involvement in federal government.

One of my core political beliefs is that our democracy works best when all citizens are active participants. And voting is one of the most powerful ways our citizens can influence the direction of their government. Although this law does not guarantee greater participation, it does remove many obstacles that have plagued our registration system for decades.

Very soon there will be few excuses left for not registering to vote, and, ultimately, for not voting. This law calls on all voting-age citizens from all backgrounds to share the responsibility for creating a government that is efficient and responsive to the people. It is a call that must not go unanswered.

Thanks students for holiday party

To the editor:

On behalf of the Amherst Survival Center and the 511 children that had a Christmas party and gifts provided for them, I would like to thank the UMass Army ROTC who collected toys and money for toys, and Vibes for hosting the party for the children.

I would also like to thank SAKE for collecting food and MassPIRG, Sigma Delta Tau and Zeta Phi Beta for assisting in the recent renovations at the Survival Center.

The work of these students at the Survival Center is a shining example of the concern for students to be active in the community. Their efforts were especially impressive as they took place during the hectic end-of-semester rush.

What do you think?

The University of Massachusetts is facing another round of budget cuts which could lead to another increase in tuition and fees. UMass/Amherst is already the second-most expensive public university in the country.

What do you think about the issue of tuition hikes? Tuition retention? A statewide sales tax earmarked for education?

Put your thoughts in the form of a letter to the editor and send it to the Opinion page at the Collegian by 3 p.m. this Wednesday afternoon.

When writing, please type your letter and keep it to a maximum of 400 words.

All letters should include a name, address and phone number (for verification purposes only). Students should also include their year and major. The Collegian reserves the right to edit all submissions for grammar, clarity and length.

Anonymous submissions will not be printed. Exceptions will be granted by the editor in extreme circumstances.

Opposition wins election

Figueres leads after campaign filled with acrimony

By BILL CORMIER
Associated Press

SAN JOSE, Costa Rica — The ruling party candidate late Sunday conceded defeat in Costa Rica's presidential election to opposition candidate Jose Maria Figueres, the son of a revered political patriarch.

Early results gave Figueres 271,950 votes and economist Miguel Angel Rodriguez 253,290 votes, the Supreme Election Tribunal said. Officials said 5,470 of the 8,363 ballot boxes had been counted.

"The people have spoken and we will respect their wishes- goodbye friends," Rodriguez said.

Costa Ricans voted for a president Sunday after a campaign filled with acrimony that was unusual for Central America's most stable country.

For the top two contenders, the race went down to the wire.

Opposition candidate Jose Maria Figueres, 39, vowed to modernize the welfare state created by his late father, three- time president Jose "Pepe" Figueres.

"What a fabulous day!" said the boyish, mustachioed Figueres before voting near the mountaintop ranch where his father launched a 1948 armed rebellion that led to Costa Rica becoming a democracy.

Figueres told The Associated Press his own polls showed him leading his opponent, 54-year-old economist Miguel Angel Rodriguez, by a narrow 3 percent.

But Figueres, a former agriculture minister and candidate of the National Liberation Party, faced a formidable adversary in Rodriguez, candidate of the ruling Social Christian Unity Party.

Rodriguez attended a Roman Catholic Mass in a poor neighborhood of San Jose before voting there. Hundreds of supporters of both major parties waved banners, honked horns and urged compatriots to vote.

The last Gallup poll, at midweek, showed Figueres leading by 1 percentage point and well within the poll's 3-percent margin of error. Analysts widely considered the race too close to call.

It was a rough campaign. Figueres was accused of being involved in the murder of a drug dealer some 20 years ago. He sued the authors of a book who made the charge, but in November, a judge absolved them.

Figueres also was tied to a mining scandal in the 1980s. A court ruled recently that he was involved but that the statute of limitations had expired.

Figueres in turn accused Rodriguez — a cattle producer and businessman — of shipping tainted beef to the United States.

ing Harding prior to the disciplinary hearing.

"I would prefer to have Tonya have her time with the hearing panel, to follow through and to make sure she'd had her chance to speak with the member panel," Ferguson said Sunday on CBS' "Face the Nation."

Asked whether there were any conditions under which she might suspend Harding before the Olympics, Ferguson replied:

"No, because I believe that the Olympics has a different set of rules that can handle this If they so choose. We are concerned with our world championships as well as the Olympics, which will be held in Japan in the middle of March, and we must have our team there."

Bill Hybl, chairman of the five-member USFSA panel and a former USOC president, acknowledged that the fear of a lawsuit by Harding was a factor in the association's judgment to proceed conservatively.

"I think there's no question," Hybl said. "It's been widely discussed. But this is one issue the panel discussed and the five of us decided that we were going to go forward based on the evidence, based on the rules of the articles in the bylaws of the Figure Skating Association and not really let the fact that there could be litigation be involved in our decision."

All the food that is ordered has to be checked by the test panel before it is stored. According to Fredrick, the panel rejects more that It accepts because its members are very picky. The test panel checks for salt and fat content.

The dining commons also offers students fresh vegetables that are not seasoned because that should be up to the individual, Fredrick said. The oil that the cooks use is soybean and vegetable oil. No animal fat is used because some students complained that it was against their religion and culture. From pasta to steamed rice, since no oil or salt is added, a student can have a very light meal, Fredrick said.

According to Fredrick, students always have the option of building their own salad. The salad bar offers a variety of vegetables with a choice of low fat dressings, Fredrick said. Some students bring in their own dressing, however, sometimes the dressing is the same as what is being served, Fredrick said.

"Students can't see the labels, so they assume the worst," Fredrick said.

Fredrick said that the most popular food is french fries, hamburgers, fried chicken cutlets and sugar enriched cereals.

"People say they want to eat healthy until they sit down, then taste comes first," Fredrick said.

Unity celebrated with song, dance and appreciation

"We praise You that in Your vision, barriers that separate humanity are torn down ... Give us strength to open our hearts and minds to those of other religions, races, economic, academic, social and political differences," said Joanna Kurkowicz, one of the many speakers at yesterday's International Sunday, an event held at Amherst's First Congregational Church.

This celebration of unity has been held every year since 1974 to commemorate peace and understanding throughout the world. Members of various religions, including Baha'i, Buddism, Christianity, Judaism, Muslim and Sikh, shared readings, prayers, songs and dances from their respective religions and cultures.

A special moment of this event was when Reverend Bruce Arbour called the children to the altar to his gray, fuzzy friend, a puppet. The Kentucky claws past Minutemen

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
COLLEGIAN SPORTS WRITER

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — No. 7 Kentucky scored the final seven points down the stretch en route to a 67–64 victory over No. 11 Massachusetts in the Meadowlands Arena yesterday. A buzzer-beating, top-of-the-key trey from Minuteman forward Dontu Bright in an attempt to send the game into overtime fell short, giving Coach Rick Pitino's Wildcats their third straight win over Coach John Calipari's Minutemen.

Kentucky raises its record to 18–3, while the Minutemen drop to 17–4.

Jared Prickett led Kentucky with 17 points and 15 rebounds, but the story of the game was Massachusetts forward Lou Roe, who poured in 28 points and snagged 13 boards, dominating the paint on both ends of the court. Roe's effort went for naught, however, as the Minutemen could not convert a field goal in the last 3:10.

Massachusetts' last deuce from the floor was Roe's final two as well; the junior from Atlantic City, N.J., put back a Bright miss, giving the Minutemen a 61–60 lead. After guard Edgar Padilla (11 points, five assists, three steals) hit one of two from the free throw line and forward Dana Dingle (eight points, three rebounds) swished both of his from the charity stripe, with 2:21 left and Massachusetts up by four, 64–60, Kentucky took control.

A Tony Delk (16 points, six rebounds, three assists) pull- up in the lane cut the Wildcat deficit to two, 64–62; with 1:17, the Massachusetts four-point lead was gone as a Prickett lay-up tied the contest at 64.

Two Rodrick Rhodes' free-throws put Kentucky ahead to stay, but after Prickett missed one of two freebies, Massachusetts had one last gasp with 4.2 seconds remaining.

Dingle inbounded the ball from half-court to Roe in the paint, who kicked it out to Bright (10 points, six rebounds) for the three-pointer, which bounced off the front rim.

"Well, you guys saw a heck of a basketball game," said Calipari in the post-game press conference. "I think you saw two teams go at each other like it was an NCAA Final Four game — with reckless abandon, with all-out effort, with passion, with emotion. People who came today saw a great basketball game."

"We were very fortunate to win this game," said Pitino. "Either way, I'm very proud of our guys because they executed down the stretch and we didn't think we could win unless we negated the backboard."

Kentucky and Massachusetts finished with 40 rebounds each (17 offensive and 23 defensive for each team). The Minutemen have averaged five boards better than their opponent this season, a key to many of their victories, according to Pitino, along with defensive field goal percentage.

Massachusetts closed the first half on an 18–2 run, including a Padilla trey before the clock hit :00, giving the Minutemen a halftime lead of 36–29. Freshman center Marcus Camby's finger roll less than a minute and change into the second half gave Massachusetts its biggest lead, 38– 29. But Kentucky wouldn't fold, as the Wildcat defense clamped down on the Minutemen for the next 7:04, outscoring Massachusetts 18–7 to take a 47–41 advantage.

Amidst the run, Calipari received a technical foul when Massachusetts led 43–42. Kentucky point guard Travis Ford (10 points, three assists) hit both foul shots, allowing the Wildcats to overtake the Minutemen for the first time since 3:03 left in the first half.

Total team rebounds was not the only category Kentucky and Massachusetts were identical in; both squads made 24 shots from the field (the Wildcats attempted one more than the Minutemen), both made 14 free-throws (the Minutemen attempted one more). The glaring difference?

The final score, Kentucky by three.

Player of the Game

UMass basketball

Lou Roe, Massachusetts

Very seldom does the player of the game come from the losing squad, but Roe deserved it. From start to finish, he was the best player on the court, scoring 28 points, grobbing 13 boards and showing the fire that he had in his eyes when the Minutemen first made their jump into the Top 10 back in December of last year. Calipari benched his junior co– captain two games ago against Rhode Island and the 6–foot– 7 forward has responded, regressing back to the form that makes him an All–America candidate.

Why Kentucky won the game

The Minutemen failed to convert on their final two possessions with under o minute to go; Edgar Padilla was forced into o runner in the lane that was no good, simply because the Minutemen didn't have a set play in the half-court offense. Calipari took the blame himself, saying that he should have called a time–out instead of asking the freshman to do taa much this early in his career.

It was a game of halves. Calipari's game preparation for the Kentucky press was superb, leading to Massachusetts' seven–point advantage at the half. But the second belonged to Pitino, who, according to Calipari, showed why he's the best in America. Kentucky's 2–3 zone defense gave the Minutemen problems and allowed the Wildcats to get back in the game and eventually pull the victory out.

John Calipari, coach of the Minutemen, matched wits with his rival, Coach Rick Pitino of Kentucky.

Coaches take center stage

Calipari's Minutemen fall to Pitino's Wildcats again

By Jeff Crofts
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

There was the story in yesterday's Boston Globe titled "COACH CALIPITINO" chronicling the similarities between Massachusetts Coach John Calipari and Kentucky Coach Rick Pitino.

There are the similar looks, similar passionate coaching styles and the similar senses of humor. And, usually, there are the similar results.

Except for yesterday, that is.

Calipari will be forever linked with Pitino. Most people know how Pitino, a UMass graduate, helped his alma mater choose Calipari as the new Minuteman coach some six years ago.

But yesterday at the Meadowlands Arena in East Rutherford, N.J., it was Pitino and his Wildcats who got the better of Calipari and his Minutemen. In a ferociously tough contest, the Wildcats prevailed 67–64.

Despite the difference in the final score, the statistical numbers that added up to that score were remarkably similar. UMass shot 24 for 59 from the floor; Kentucky was 24 for 60. UMass shot 14 for 22 from the free throw line; Kentucky was 14 for 21. UMass had 16 turnovers and 20. personal fouls; Kentucky had 17 turnovers and 19 personals. Both teams grabbed 17 offensive and 23 defensive rebounds.

Now that is downright cery.

It was the third Installment of UMass–Kentucky and Calipari–Pitino, with the other two contests taking place two years ago.

The score is now Pitino 3, Calipari 0. Kentucky 3, UMass 0.

But the games between the historic, storied University of Kentucky and the newly established University of Massachusetts keep getting closer and closer. The margins of victory for Kentucky in their three wins over UMass has gone from 21 to 10 to three. Pitino knows about the great job Calipari has done at his old school.

"This (UMass) is the greatest building job I've ever seen," said Pitino. "Because not only was it done on the court, not only was it done with hard work, dealing with the media, exposing the program, getting on TV, going on the road like most coaches don't want to do, building an arena when the state is broke.

"John Calipari has just done a phenomenal job, and I'm really proud being an alumnus to the school to see this program," Pitino said.

And Calipari said he relished the opportunity he had yesterday to show Pitino just how good the UMass program has become.

"It's a great challenge, just think of that challenge," said Calipari. "I mean you're going against the best there is, you're going on a neutral court, obviously because he (Pitino) will never play us at home, and you're going to war. Hey, he's the best.

"And guess what? He was the best today."

Would Calipari like for his Minutemen to have yet another crack at Pitino's Wildcats?

"I hope we get them in the championship game this year in Charlotte," Calipari said.

Now, while Pitino would be sure to make that final game as well, he wouldn't like the matchup as much as he would say... six years ago.

As cameras roll, so does 'TV' Lou Roe

By Sean P. Hayden
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — Lights. Camera. Action. Lou Roe.

This has been the scenario for the 6–foot–7 Massachusetts forward since his arrival in Amherst three years ago.

Roe seems to shine brightest when the spotlight is more intense and yesterday's disappointing loss against the Kentucky Wildcats was no different. All the national media coverage and hullabaloo surrounding a big game brings out the best in the big fella from Atlantic City known around the country as "TV" Lou Roe.

"I got that name from Bill Raftery freshman year," Roe said. "Going into the tournament that year, Coach Cal told him I play better on television.

"Raftery just took it from there; blew it out of proportion."

Did he?

Consider that Roe had an almost identieal line (28 points, 14 rebounds, 2 assists) in the Minutemen's nationally televised upset of No. 1 North Carolina as he had in last night's loss (28–13–1), which by the way, was on ABC.

Consider that in the three games the king of college basketball, Dick Vitale, has covered the Minutemen

Hockey on short end in Merrimack rematch

By Matt Vautour
COLLEGIAN SPORTS

Despite a strong third period and excellent play from goaltender Rich Moriarty, the Massachusetts hockey team suffered its first home loss of the season, 4–1, to Merrimack yesterday.

The Warriors, who came in riding a hot streak, after two big wins over Hockey East rival Boston College, showed no signs of letdown during yesterday's contest.

The problems started early for UMass as center Blair Manning sprained his ankle when he fell during pregame warm-ups.

The Minutemen came out fired up, as they attempted to avenge their 8–2 season–opening loss to the Warriors, but Merrimack's talent and experience proved too much for the young Minutemen to over come.

The Warriors scored first, when Chris Ross collected a centering pass from linemate Quentin Fendeltet and backhanded it past Moriarty for a 1–0 lead.

The Minutmen had scoring opportunities, but Merrimack goalie Martin Legault was brilliant, turning back 10 first period shots.

"He [Legault] played a great game," said Merrimack Coach Ron Anderson. "He really kept us in the game."

Merrimack settled into its game in the second period as penalties and sloppy passing plagued the Minutemen, scoring two power play goals in less than five minutes, giving the Warriors a 3–0 advantage at the second intermission.

The Minutemen, who refused to go down without a fight, outplayed the Warriors in the final period, peppering Legault repeatedly. Rich Alger finally solved Legault scoring a power play goal on to make it 3–1.

Merrimack ended Massachusetts' comeback hopes when Matt Adams poked a shot past Moriarty to give the Warriors a 4–1 lead.

"We never quit," said Mallen. "I couldn't be prouder. I want our guys to play hard right down to the end. Our guys got great experience out there tonight."

Moriarty was a bright spot for the Minutemen, turning in his second consecutive strong performance against a Division I opponent.
